petent to decide, and although the Committee of Claims may be somewhat more competent in that respect, I venture to say they would rather have it referred to the law officers of the Government.

Mr. SPALDING. Being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to say in addition to what has fallen from the chairman of the committee, [Mr. STEVENS,] that my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] is mistaken in regard to this joint resolution. The subject-matter of this resolution is not a proper subject of investigation for the Committee of Claims. It is simply a legal, a judicial question, and the Committee on Appropriations did not themselves seek to solve it. If it should be referred to any committee of this body, it would properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary. But the resolution simply directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under the legal advice of the Attorney General of the United States, give a construction and interpretation to the contract entered into with these parties.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to know how this joint resolution comes before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. It was sent to us by the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand that.

Mr. SPALDING. And the House sent it to the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose the gentleman understands that also.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, I understand that; but have the Committee on Appropriations been called upon for reports this morning?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then how did this resolution come to be reported by them?

The SPEAKER. They are authorized to report at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I take it that even the Committee on Appropriations cannot report such a bill as this except for reference to a proper committee.

The SPEAKER. When the House proceeded to consider and debate the measure the rule was waived.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations have no jurisdiction over such subjects as this.

Mr. SPALDING. The House referred it to that committee for consideration.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I know that; but the House frequently sends bills to committees that do not properly have jurisdiction of them. I know that the Committee on Commerce, when subjects are sent to them that do not properly come within their jurisdiction, report them back to the House, ask to be discharged from their further consideration, and move their reference to the committees which are properly charged with their consideration.

It was but yesterday that the Committee on Appropriations reported a bill in regard to certain claims of the State of Missouri, of which they certainly had no jurisdiction, and which certainly should have been referred to the Committee of Claims. I think, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has said, that the Committee of Claims is the proper committee to examine and consider this subject.

And now I desire to call the attention of this House to the language of this joint resolution, so that they may judge whether more information is not needed by them before they confer this power upon the Secretary of the Treasury. What does this joint resolution provide? It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the accounts of Beals & Dixon, for deliveries of materials after the 1st of May, 1861, under their contract with the United States, to be adjusted and paid, and to allow to them such additional prices as in his opinion they may be entitled to under the provisions of their supplemental contract dated January 1, 1857; provided that in the opinion of the Attorney General said Beals & Dixon have a lawful claim upon the United States for an increase of price under their contract.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] if a supplemental contract was made.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir. Mr. WRIGHT. And is not the United States bound by that contract?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly. But the point I make against this joint resolution is that you are taking from the House the authority to adjust this matter and putting it into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I therefore move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Claims, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Claims.

On agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 46, noes 16; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. PIKE, and Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT TO MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill no 156, entitled "An act making an additional grant of land to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF KANSAS WAR CLAIM.

The last business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 259, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to settle the claims of the State of Kansas for services of the militia called out by the Governor of that State upon the requisition of Major General Curtis, the commander of the United States forces in that State;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DESTITUTE PEOPLE OF THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is a joint resolution (S. No. 49) for the temporary relief of destitute people in the District of Columbia. This resolution was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour. The question is on ordering the resolution to be read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The other day, when this measure was before the House, I had read a statement of A. C. Richards, superintendent of police, setting forth the necessity for this appropriation. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. Will not the gentleman yield to allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will hear what the amendment is.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to propose an amendment providing that this money shall be appropriated without distinction of race or color.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is already provided for. We have no class legislation on our side.

Mr. ROGERS. I propose further to provide that this money shall be expended by the authorities of Washington, instead of the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau, who will expend it for the benefit of the colored people only.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot yield for that amendment. It is unnecessary.

Mr. SHANKLIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. INGERSOLL. For what purpose?

Mr. SHANKLIN. I desire to discuss the merits of this proposition.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as I personally am concerned, I should be glad to afford the gentleman the opportunity to make a speech; but I must be governed by the will of the House. If the House desires to hear the gentleman, it will refuse to sustain the demand for the previous question.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 44, noes 27; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and SHANKLIN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 36.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. INGERSOLL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 101, nays 21, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brundage, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelson, Ketcham, Ladin, Latham, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Munton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Platts, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—101.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Coffroth, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Harris, Edwin N. Hubbell, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, and Wright—21.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Blow, Boyer, Brownell, Bundy, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, DeForest, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hogan, Dora Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Kaykendall, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Marston, McCullough, McClintock, Moorhead, Newell, Neill, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—61.

So the joint resolution was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COBB stated that Mr. McINDOE was detained from the House by serious illness.

Mr. DARLING stated that Mr. J. HUMPHREY had been called home on account of sickness in his family.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

At the suggestion of the SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, the evening session was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that it had concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 31, to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion; and Senate bill No. 199, to establish the collection district of Port Huron, the collection district of Michigan, and to extend the collection district of Puget Sound.

Also, that it had passed the following bills, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 255) to remit and refund certain duties;

An act (S. No. 243) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road; and

An act (S. No. 122) for the relief of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, for depredations committed by white persons upon his property in Kansas.

Also, that it had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 150) for the relief of Almon W. Babbitt, late secretary of Utah; and

An act (H. R. No. 471) to provide that the "Soldier's Individual Memorial" shall be carried through the mails at the usual rate of printed matter.

And also, that it had adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having listened to eulogies on the character and public services of Hon. Solomon Foot, a Senator from the State of Vermont, lately deceased, out of respect to his memory have voted to adjourn.

DEATH OF SENATOR FOOT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the message from the Senate concerning the death of Senator Foot.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, but a few weeks ago the distinguished Senator whom we now mourn arose from his seat in the Senate and pronounced a most eloquent and impressive eulogy upon his colleague, who had been gathered to his fathers in the fullness of his years, crowned with private worth and public honor. And now, before the cypress leaf is wilted, or the first gushing tear is dried, we are called, in the providence of God, to a fresher grief for him who so freely mingled his tears with ours at the death of Judge Collamer, whom none knew but to honor and love.

At that time Mr. Foot was apparently in perfect health. His constitution was unimpaired by any exposure or excess, and his splendid and almost unrivaled physical development gave promise of many years of vigorous and active life, for he possessed—

"A combination and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man."

In speaking of the life and character of Mr. Foot, I shall simply attempt to do justice. Unqualified praise of the dead is never either in good taste or truthful. Human character is never perfect; at best it is only good in parts.

Mr. Foot was born in Cornwall, in the State of Vermont, in 1802. He graduated at Middlebury College with distinguished honor in 1826, and the same year became principal of the seminary at Castleton. He was tutor in the University of Vermont in 1827; and again, from 1828 to 1831, principal of Castleton Seminary, and by his earnest efforts and marked executive ability gave such an impulse and character to the institution that it ranked for many years among the first of the classical schools of Vermont. In the midst of his faithful and arduous labors as a teacher he devoted the time usually given to recreation and the refined pleasures of social life to the study of the law, and in 1831 was admitted to the bar in Rutland, and immediately commenced the practice of his profession. For five years he was a member of the Legislature of Vermont, and for three years Speaker of the House of Representatives. From 1836 to 1842 he was prosecuting attorney for the county of Rutland. He was a member of the constitutional convention which established the Senate as a coördinate branch of the Legislature of Vermont, in which body he actively cooperated with his late colleague, Judge Collamer. From 1843 to 1847 he was a member of this body, and declined a third election. In 1850 he was elected Senator of the United States, and occupied the position until the day of his death.

Such is a brief recital of the public and official positions occupied by Senator Foot, embracing a period of nearly a third of a century. Born of highly respectable but comparatively poor parents, he was by force of circumstances thrown upon his own resources, and early in life acquired independent habits of thought and action. Without any of the adventitious surroundings of wealth or station or patronage, without any of that extreme brilliancy of genius which now and then startles and dazzles the world, he looked upon life as a great reality and upon success as the reward of labor. He was rather solid than showy. He lacked genius, but possessed talent and judgment. His qualities did not shine forth like the greater lights in the heavens, but there was in them a proportion and harmony which gave a moral grandeur to the man. Hence Senator Foot was what we call a self-made man. I do not attribute to him any particular credit for that. The term "self-made man" is a much-abused one. There is no royal road to greatness. Every man who comes to be a power reaches it through personal effort. The scholar is self-made, and becomes a scholar through patient and exhausting labor and reflection. The professional man is self-made, and so is the merchant and the artisan. That Senator Foot succeeded where a weak will would have failed is doubtless true, and hence the greater honor to the man. As a lawyer, Mr. Foot was not learned. As a statesman, he never seized upon new theories or ventured upon untried paths. As a political economist, he never originated new ideas or developed old ones with extraordinary power; and yet, without question, he was one of the safest statesmen and most judicious legislators of the age.

He did not resemble the mountain, towering to the skies, barren and useless from its height, but rather the lesser eminence, whose summit is covered with the forest, and whose slopes wave with the yellow grain. He did not resemble the terrific shower which destroys by its violence, so much as the gentle rain which the earth drinks and then dresses herself in new life and beauty.

God granted Mr. Foot one of the greatest of earthly blessings, a loving, praying, pious mother, who early instilled into his mind principles of reverence toward God, obedience to authority, and love of truth; and through a long public life the great leading characteristic of his mind, and perhaps the highest power of his character, was his devotion to truth; that high ethical truth which is grounded in the moral being and the fitness of things, lying back of and deeper than refinements or popularities, reaching down to the inner nature and elevating the moral forces.

"His word was as good as his bond." No social or political combination or influence; no sycophantic flatterer; no dastardly and cunning insinuator; no expectation of reward or place or power ever shook the truthfulness of SOLOMON FOOT.

"Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Nor number nor example with him wrought
To swerve from truth or change his constant mind, Though single."

Senator Foot was a patriotic man.

"He loved his land because it was his own
And scorned to give aught other reason why."

He cherished the principles of the Declaration of Independence. He believed that all men were created free and equal; and yet subordinated his acts and theories to the Constitution of the land. Constitutional liberty was his watchword, and when by force of law all men became absolutely free he was the earnest and fearless advocate of those measures designed to protect the freedman in all his civil rights.

But, sir, when the first gun was fired at Fort Sumter, and the cry "To arms!" echoed from peak to peak of the mountains of his native State, then the nobleness, the patriotism, the generosity of SOLOMON FOOT shone forth like a star. Calmly and serenely he met the issue, and everywhere infused into the people his own heroic and enthusiastic nature. And when at times during the progress of the rebellion the clouds seemed to lower about us, his faith in God and liberty never faltered. He trusted in the right. He met and performed every obligation of duty without fear and without reproach. The highest and proudest encomium which a public man can ever receive is justly his. Popular at home beyond description; elevated by the people to almost every office within their gift; beloved, honored, and trusted, he always and everywhere proved himself an honest man—the noblest work of God.

He loved his native State. To him there was no air so pure as that which swept about her mountains; no water so sweet as that which bubbled from her crystal springs; no grass so green as that which clothed her valleys; and he now lies beneath the shadow of her hills, where the wind sings his requiem and the solemn old pines stand as sentinels over his dust.

During the long and bloody rebellion, when suffering and death entered almost every household, no wounded soldier, no weeping sister, no heart-broken wife or mother ever called upon Senator Foot in vain. Their wants were his wants. Their suffering was his suffering. In sunshine and in rain, in sickness and in health, by tender and sympathizing counsel, and by active and efficient effort, he labored for their relief; and we may truthfully say for him, "When the eyes saw me then it blessed me. When the ear heard me it gave witness to me, for I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy."

Mr. Speaker, it is a glorious thing to live in this world. When its Creator launched it forth in the perfection of its beauty, the morning stars sang together for joy. It was made for man, the last exercise of creative power, for man made in the image God, into whose nostrils he breathed the breath of life. It is noble to live for the development of the soul. It is beautiful to appreciate and enjoy all the works of God, and all the endearing relations with which we are surrounded. It is glorious

"To have
Attentive and believing faculties;
To go abroad rejoicing in the joy
Of beautiful and well-created things;
To love the voice of waters and the sheen
Of silver fountains leaping to the sea;
To thrill with the rich melody of birds
Living their life of music; to be glad
In the gay sunshine, reverent in the storm;
To see a beauty in the stirring leaf;
To find calm thoughts beneath the whispering tree;
To see and hear and breathe the evidence
Of God's deep wisdom in the natural world."

But more beautiful than life is the death of the Christian.

Mr. Foot from the commencement of his sickness seemed to feel that he would die, and when the final summons came he was ready.

His last thought was for his country, and his last desire to look out upon the beautiful sunlight and this noble edifice, where he had labored so long and where he believed the future safety of the Republic rested; and then, as if fully satisfied, with eyes full of celestial radiance, he exclaimed, "I see it! I see it! The gates are wide open! Beautiful! Beautiful!" and the plastic form was stilled; the casket was broken, and SOLOMON FOOT entered upon eternal rest.

Mr. Speaker, the life of a good man like that of him we mourn is not confined to its immediate and most apparent results. Its influence lives on, inspiring other men to lives of nobleness and duty. It is the pillar of fire by night and cloud by day that safely guides us in our weary wanderings. Let us mark it well, so that when to us the last dread summons comes we each may—

"Go, not like the quarry slave at night
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach our graves
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BANKS then pronounced a eulogy on Senator Foor. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on becoming a member of the House of Representatives in the Thirty-Third Congress in the month of December, 1853, I first made the acquaintance of SOLOMON FOOR, then a Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Vermont. I had known something of his previous political history and was aware that he had enjoyed, in a high degree, the respect and confidence of the people of his native State. To possess the confidence and receive the support of the citizens of Vermont is no meager or indifferent compliment. No State has ever guarded more carefully the selection of its representatives in the national councils; for within my recollection no man in either branch of Congress from that State has ever proved faithless to liberty, or has ever had the stain of dishonor or venality upon his garments.

It is in the Green Mountain State that there is to be found the type of the truest democracy, resting upon the immutable basis of universal intelligence and public virtue. In no State can be found a loftier patriotism, a more ardent love of liberty, and a more undying hatred of slavery than among the constituents of the late distinguished Senator from Vermont. When mad-dened treason raised its parrietal hand to tear down the fabric of our Government, and the torch of civil war was lighted, the people of no State rallied with greater alacrity and enthusiasm than the people of the State of Vermont. Her brave and hardy sons filled all her highways and by-ways; they came forth from her hills and valleys, and from all the gorges of her ever-green mountains, and marched with the rapidity of the eagle to the defense of their imperiled country, and to vindicate the honor and the glory and the unity of the Republic.

I say, sir, to have been honored and trusted by such a people to the extent that Mr. Foor was honored and trusted, is one of the highest compliments that could have been paid to a public man. As has been stated, he entered the Senate in 1850, and being twice reelected, served continuously till the time of his death. Hence, he served through the most exciting and turbulent period of our whole legislative history, and was a participant in the revolutionary scenes which, to the philosophic observer, were the omens of that terrible civil war that has drenched our country in blood. I saw him in the Senate in the Thirty-Third Congress, one of the little band of courageous and patriotic men who resisted with unsurpassed ability and eloquence the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

I saw him when the slaveholders, in the pride and insolence of their power, undertook to "crush out" in the Senate every aspiration for liberty and every noble and elevated sentiment of freedom; when treason, upheld by a perfidious and treacherous Executive, stalked through the Senate Hall with brazen impudence, and when the galleries howled their applause of traitors. Undaunted and undismayed, while all the political elements were lashed into fury around him, he bore himself in a manner becoming an American Senator, and courageously vindicated his own opinions and the sentiments and convictions of his own liberty-loving constituents.

From his long association and thorough acquaintance with the southern Senators, Mr. Foor early fathomed their wicked designs and their treasonable purposes, and from the moment those purposes found an utterance in the hostile cannon that opened upon Fort Sumter, his heart and soul, his thoughts, and his energies were all given to his country. With a loyalty so devoted and uncompromising, with a love of country amounting to a passion, he everywhere denounced treason and its aiders and abettors with the most vehement indignation.

At the time of his death he was the oldest member of the Senate in consecutive service. Every year increased his reputation and confirmed his character as a steadfast friend to his country, an enlightened statesman, and a wise and incorruptible legislator. He was a man of education and intelligence, of a vigorous intellect and an enlightened understanding; of giant strength and an imposing presence, he was a genuine specimen of a Vermonter. As Presiding Officer of the Senate for a long period he distinguished himself by his promptness, dignity, urbanity, and fairness. He brought to the discharge of all his duties a conscientious devotion to the best interests of the nation. Active, industrious, vigilant, no duty to his constituents and the country was ever left unperformed, and so prompt and regular was he in attendance upon the daily sessions of the Senate that it could be said of him as the historian says of the younger Cato, "he was always first at the Senate and went out last."

Mr. Foor bore a prominent part in all our legislation during the war for the Union, and his influence and vote were always given to the most energetic measures, and those best calculated to strengthen the hands of the Government in its gigantic task of saving the country. To the Administration of Mr. Lincoln he gave a warm and even an enthusiastic support. I had occasion to know of the strength of his attachment to that distinguished man, and to know how gratefully his friendship was reciprocated. Mr. Lincoln had not, in the whole length and breadth of the land, a more earnest and sincere friend; and no man stood by him, through all the perils and difficulties of his Administration, with more unflinching devotion; and the people of Illinois will cherish this remembrance with gratitude.

And when the time came for the representatives of a great and heartstricken people to pay the last tribute of respect and affection to the memory of their martyr President, it was fitting and proper that Mr. Foor, the Pater Senatus, should, as the chairman of the joint committee of the two Houses, be charged with the management of the proceedings. Profoundly anxious that the ceremonies should be worthy the august occasion, he entered on his duties with zeal and enthusiasm.

He devoted himself with untiring energy to the accomplishment of the purpose. No man understood better than he did what belonged to such an occasion, and he gave his personal attention to all the details and saw for himself that nothing which was necessary to be done was left undone. The day was cold, stormy, cheerless. At an early hour Mr. Foor's duties commenced. The crowd was great and the pressure for admittance was tremendous, and he had to exert himself to the utmost to see that order was preserved and that the arrangements were properly carried out. And all who were present know how admirably and satisfactorily everything passed off.

Though it was my fortune to be associated with him in that duty, it is but just to say that all the credit of the successful management of the ceremonies belonged to him. After the proceedings were over, exhausted and overcome with fatigue, Mr. Foor went to his lodgings, and that night was attacked with the disease which terminated his life. I saw him at his rooms two days after he was taken sick, and he then believed himself so far recovered that he would be enabled to go with me the next morning to call on the distinguished citizen who delivered the eulogy and to convey to him the resolution of Congress requesting a copy of the same for publication. He was not, however, able to go, but sent his colleague in the Senate, Judge POLAND, in his place.

On the next day, Friday the 16th day of February, the late Senator from Vermont appeared in the Senate for the last time and made his final report as chairman of the joint committee of arrangements, and his last motion was, that "the report and accompanying papers be printed." He continued to take a deep interest in the publication of the Eulogy and the proceedings connected therewith, and the last official act of his life was to approve a portrait of Mr. Lincoln, which is to be the frontispiece to the volume of the published proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, when we contemplate the great changes that have taken place among the public men who were associated with Mr. Foor when he first entered the Senate, and since the time when you and I first entered these Halls, we are admonished how fleeting and evanescent are all things human. How few are left to struggle on but yet a little longer, to buffet the waves and encounter the storms and the tempests of political life:

Vermont mourns the loss of her faithful and devoted public servant, and the nation shares in her grief. He followed, alas! too soon, him who had so lately been his colleague. The mournful accents of eulogy pronounced in this Chamber upon the illustrious Collamer had scarcely died away before we were called upon to follow to the grave his companion, adviser, friend, so long associated with him in the service of the country.

These two great American Senators, both alike eminent for their Christian virtues, their eminent statesmanship, their devoted patriotism, their long and useful public services, and their unsullied integrity, have passed away, and the places on earth that have known them will know them no more forever. They have gone, but they have left to the country the richest legacy in the recollection of their well-spent and honored lives.

Mr. DAWSON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to second the resolution of the gentleman from Vermont.

In the discharge of public duty the paths of the Senator and the Representative of necessity lie measurably apart. Most of Mr. Foor's political convictions were not mine. With such obstacles in the way of intimate relations, either private or official, I cannot, of course, reveal those finer and higher qualities of his nature, which great spirits like his never parade before the world, and display only upon impulse to the most sincere and affectionate of friends. But I know of him what all men knew of him, and I esteem it a privilege, which any just man might seek, to add my voice to the universal exclamations of sorrow which his death has wrung from every part of the land.

It is unnecessary to repeat here Mr. Foor's long and arduous services in public place. The country is familiar with his record. It is enough that his own State kept him so long in the Senate that at the close of his life he was regarded as the father of the body—the oldest of all in continuous service. He mingled in those debates of the Senate which the common judgment of mankind assigns a place beside the grandest specimens of classic oratory, when they were conducted by statesmen who were the rivals of Chatham, Burke, and Fox.

He sat under the impetuous eloquence of Clay, the terse and severe logic of Calhoun, the rich and luminous periods of Webster. He was there amid those portentous scenes which preceded the late civil war, when all hearts were oppressed with the deep dread of coming disaster, when the friends of free institutions in the Old World, and many in the New, feared that the American Union was crumbling into fragments. It was the mightiest conflict that ever shook the earth. He saw from that high theater as well of contention as of observation the rise, career, and downfall of several political parties. Of such long experience, full of years and full of honors, wise and prudent, pure and upright, brave but philosophic, surely Solomon Foot was the Nestor among his official peers.

Few men's opinions were ever sought with more respect or received with more reverence than his. In the midst of a revolution second only to the "reign of terror" which drenched France with blood, and filled her beautiful cities and gardens with the graves of her people, when all our fiercest passions were aroused, his counsels to the ends of moderation and justice, soothing and subduing the vengeful feelings of the time, fell like the voice of that "old man eloquent" under the gates of Troy.

Though he was gifted with remarkable firmness of purpose, and his mind had a sort of Roman vigor, he was eminently a good and eminently a mild man. It may be said that he combined the modesty of a woman with the constant integrity of Cato. Of Mr. Foot's moral character I need only say that it was without and above reproach. He was fearless and determined in the assertion of a right, but he was equally careful of the rights of others. No lure and no force could seduce or drive him to the perpetration of that which he knew to be wrong. He had that judicial cast of mind which constrains its possessor to analyze thoroughly with patience and perseverance whatever is submitted for decision, and to eliminate with unerring precision all the elements of evil. If he had not been a great Senator he would have been a great judge.

The circumstances of Mr. Foot's departure from this life were of too sacred and hallowed a nature to be detailed here. Conscious that dissolution was rapidly approaching he showed the high qualities of his character in the religious fervor and the steadfast hope which grew warmer and stronger as he died. To the very latest moment he shed upon all who entered his presence the inspirations of a large and enlightened soul.

The last parting glance of the expiring Senator was turned to the dome of this Capitol. He begged to be lifted that he might see it once more—the scene of his long labors, the spot where he had well earned the veneration of his countrymen—and then closed his eyes on the earth forever. It was the exhibition of the same patriotic fervor so eloquently expressed by Webster in his reply to Hayne. He rejoiced to see that the flag was still there, "full high advanced," the emblem of our nationality and the Union of the States.

Mr. Foot has gone to his grave in the same soil with that other pure and honored Senator of Vermont who preceded him but a few months. It is said that amid the mighty mountains freedom loves to rear her brave and sturdy children. But no mountains on the globe, not even those of Scotland which overlook the grave of Bruce, or those of Switzerland which cast their shadows over that of William Tell, have ever kept sentry over the tombs of two nobler men or harder patriots than do the Green mountains of Vermont.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, the words of affection are few, and only those shall I utter.

It is a pleasing reflection that my early years were spent near the mountain home of the lamented Senator. He gave me assurance of his friendship, and that he cherished the memory of my dearest deceased kindred furnishes me an occasion to pay a brief and sorrowful tribute to his character and virtues.

That biography which follows the eulogistic sketches in the forum will place the deceased in the front rank of our truly Americanized gentlemen and statesmen, the measure of whose success should be unseparated from the associations and means by which it was attained.

The grave Senator ever with emotion and pride spoke of the rural town of Cornwall, Vermont, where he was born. Its population is not a thousand souls, and less than at the beginning of this century, yet has the distinguishing honor, in addition to an intelligent yeomanry, that of furnishing thirty-six educated clergymen, eighteen lawyers, twenty-three physicians, and fourteen professional teachers. Its town institutions were the church, the lyceum, and the school. In the church young Solomon was baptized; at the lyceum he spoke to give promise of future eminence; and the school he left to become a teacher and college graduate, later tutor, and founder and head of an institution of learning. He honored the vocation of the schoolmaster and never wearied in giving this humble profession credit for its devotion to a refined civilization and the general welfare. With truly American simplicity he taught our youth self-reliance, and for himself, who owed nothing to wealth, the partiality of friends, or the issue of campaigns, he regarded it as fortunate that he was called in discipline to tread the hard, rough paths of life. He was proud of his origin; and that filial affection of a fatherless boy for a doting and devoted mother was an augury of future fidelity and devotion to the national weal most fortunately realized in more than a quarter of a century of service, and ending with one of the most glorious tributes on record to the worth of parental instruction and the reality and value of the Christian religion.

As husband and father he was doting and beloved; a scholar without pedantry; a gentleman free from the arts of the courtier; brave in action without bravado; matchless in volume and sweetness of voice; persuasive in eloquence, yet abstemious in speech; genial as a companion, unwavering in friendship; in society "Pliant as reeds where streams of freedom glide;"

A Senator and statesman,

"Firm as the hills to stem oppression's tide."

Wheeling in eddies on life's stream, he could not prevent the gaze of the multitude, and ever in the presence of the claims of honor, mercy, and justice, his noble heart was so moved that this is its fitting accord and representation:

"His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, this was a man!"

Bereaved and gallant people of Vermont, millions are in mourning with you to-day. Memorable in history and conspicuous by the service of your public servants, it has been your fortune to furnish a noble exemplar for the nation, reflecting in character the grandeur of your ever-green mountains and the clear waters distilled in the rugged cliffs by the purity and beneficence of his memorable life now ended.

In the shadow of the shaft of the purest marble which will be reared to commemorate his virtues in the chosen place of his burial, he shall sleep with more than the honors of a martial hero, for here he met a mightier than earth's mailed soldier, the "king of terrors," and with a smile. With a premonition of an early dissolution, he was raised from his pillow to gaze once more upon this Capitol, and then, with mortal vision ended, to behold in its brightness the city of the living God, the home of the ransomed soul.

Mr. Speaker, the effort to enforce the lessons of such a life illumined by divine smiles would be almost a profane attempt. It has more than the award of the gods. Sol crescentes decedens duplicat umbras, and by so far as eternity is unmeasured by time, will his setting sun add to the lengthened shadows. I would accept it as a high honor to have recognized the proffer of the service, which I would make, by the thousands in the West who claim paterinity with the sons of the mountains who have left the old house-tree, in being their honored servant in bearing the flowers of affection from the prairies, the valley, and the mountains, moistened with their tears in memory of a friend who now sleeps in sepulture among the people whom he faithfully served, and by whom he was so ardently loved.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, never before in the history of our Government has a State been called upon to mourn the loss of both its Senators at a single session of Congress. Vermont weeps, for her Senators are not. Only a few days since and our tributes of sorrow bedewed the grave and wreathed the memory of greatly respected Senator Collamer, whose unblemished career had conferred honor, not only upon his State, but upon our whole country. Then the Senator whose decease we now mourn spoke, in unbroken health and strength, of the life and many virtues of his late illustrious associate in terms of great fullness and rare beauty; but how remote from him was the suspicion that in so brief a time his survivors would be called upon to delineate his own character, his private worth and public services, not less conspicuous, and though much unlike, moving in orbits widely apart, equally meritorious. Seldom has any State been represented by the same Senators for so long a time, and still more seldom so fittingly represented by those of so much eminence and unquestioned integrity and ability.

My colleague [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] has so happily and eloquently portrayed the history of Senator Foot, while others have so generously acknowledged his worth, that little more remains for me to contribute. Like many men who have risen to distinction in after life, (to copy his own language applied to another,) "he owed nothing at all to the factitious aids or the accidental circumstances of birth or fortune or family patronage." Having lost his father at the early age of seven years, he was indebted to an excellent and pious mother for his early training and instruction, and for the foundation of those high-toned principles of honor and integrity which always guided him as a private citizen and distinguished him as a public man. Not born to affluence, he was while yet a boy taught the lesson of earning his bread by the sweat of his brow. An incident at this time shows that his ambition had early been touched by the ethereal fire.

A man with whom he lived for a short time, when about fourteen years of age, sent him with a team to "drag" in some seed sown the previous day. Along in the middle of the forenoon the team was discovered without a driver, and the work accomplished appeared very inconsiderable. At last young Foot was found in a corner of the fence lying flat on the grass. To the question as to what he was doing there he replied, "I am thinking what I shall say when I get to be a member of Congress." Thus "the child is the father of the man." If any of these field thoughts ever found utterance in Congress, they had not to wait much longer than those said to have been conceived in the early morning on the ramparts of Quebec, and which many years after embellished one of the most memorable speeches of Daniel Webster.

While yet a young man, Mr. Foot often represented Rutland, the place of his residence, in the Legislature of Vermont, and nearly as often was made Speaker of the House of Representatives; and here he first displayed his extraordinary aptitude for the discharge of the duties of a presiding officer over a legislative assembly. This faculty was soon discovered and early recognized in the Senate of the United States, where he was repeatedly elected to the office of President pro tempore, and where he was perhaps more frequently called to the duties of the chair than any other Senator. It is just to say that much of the dignity ascribed as well as properly pertaining to that branch of Congress may be credited, for the last fifteen years, to Senator Foot's high example of decorum, order, and thorough knowledge of parliamentary routine. He dispatched business with admirable promptness, with equal fairness and grace; and he held at all times both Senate and the galleries under complete control by his commanding presence and his most unmistakable emphasis. His call to order, like the sound of a trumpet, was heard and heeded. From his decisions of parliamentary law there was no appeal asked or desired. His dignified bearing and urbanity during his service in the chair, as well as in the faithful discharge of all other senatorial duties, his massive features and courtly manners, will cause him to be associated with and long remembered as a prominent figure—a representative man—of the Senate of the United States. He will also be remembered as one of the last of those who entered the field of statesmen while the great men of the last generation—Webster, Clay, and Calhoun—yet lingered on the stage.

His speeches while in this House on the Mexican war, in 1846 and 1847, were able and fearless expositions of its origin and character, and received the hearty approval of a large proportion of the northern people. In the Senate not all of his speeches have been reported in the Globe; certainly one of his best never appeared, for the reason that he retained the report for revision until it was too late to be inserted. His patriotism infolded his whole country, and bidding defiance to all party ties, when the honor and glory of his country seemed imperiled, he roused all the energies of his impassioned nature and rushed to the rescue. This temper appeared in his speech, in 1856, on the Central American question, when England exhibited her traditional ambition for universal empire, by her pretensions connected with Honduras. He said:

"Standing in opposition as I do to the present national Administration; differing from it as I do most widely and radically upon almost every question of domestic policy, I am the more happy in being able to accord to it the tribute, worthless though it may be, of my sincere and entire approval of the position it has taken upon this question. However we may be divided among ourselves, however we may contend and wrangle upon questions of domestic interest and of local policy, yet, when it comes to a question with a foreign Power, wherein our national honor and our national interest are concerned, as in the present instance, let us exhibit to the world the beautiful and sublime spectacle of a great, a united, a harmonious people; a people having one mind, one heart, and one purpose."

Among the speeches reported, that upon the Kansas constitution, better known as the "Le-compton Swindle," was one of his best, and of marked excellence. The plot to force a pro-slavery constitution upon a free people was shown up with all its revolting features. Not a frequent speaker in the Senate, he was yet always listened to with attention when he did speak upon any subject; and upon those subjects immediately confided to his charge he possessed its entire confidence. His recent eulogy upon his deceased colleague was not only worthy of the occasion, but was a good specimen of the Senator's matter and manner, and when delivered awakened responsive chords in the hearts of all hearers by its impressive eloquence and chastened beauty.

As a public speaker before a public audience Mr. Foot occupied no mean rank. His noble figure and full-toned voice at once arrested attention. Never begrudging preliminary preparation, his speeches were clear, forcible, and well-sustained to the end. His style never lacked elevation, and without being ornate, was affluent and scholarly. Though admirable in temper, he could yet employ invective at times with crushing effect, and declaimed with the daring impetuosity of a master who felt able to both ride and guide the storm he was creating. But his great strength lay in his absolute earnestness. His voice gave forth no uncertain sound. No man ever heard him speak and went away in doubt as to his meaning or as to which side of the argument he had espoused. Having satisfied his own judgment that he was right, he embarked his whole soul and strained every nerve in the effort to bring his audience to the same conclusions with himself. He was both sincere and positive, and utterly incapable of guile or double-dealing. His integrity, moral and political, was as firmly fixed as the mountains beneath whose shadow he was born, and there was never any doubt or speculation upon any question as to where he would be found. When he spoke, therefore, he brought to bear, not only cogent argument, but the influence of a true man, the weight of an experienced legislator.

As chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings he had for a long period taken a deep interest in the work of the Capitol extension. His ideas were liberal—coextensive with the grandeur of the nation—and he would build well and for all time. He felt a pride in the splendors of the structure, fondly contemplated the time of its completion in all its parts, when all the vacant niches as well as the old Hall of the House of Representatives should be filled with the statues of our fathers, when the surrounding grounds should be enlarged, and believed in the end the world would not be able to show Government buildings and grounds more imposing or so appropriately magnificent. It was the Capitol of a nation of freemen! What wonder, then, that he should in his last hour close the drama by wishing to be so raised in his bed that his eyes might once more behold the rays of the morning sun glittering upon the majestic dome and illumining those Halls wherein he had long been so noted an actor.

He was a modest man and obeyed the Gospel precept, "not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think," and esteemed "others" better than himself. Few men who spoke so well have been able to content themselves with speaking so unfrequently. He always appeared to underrate his own performances, and never, I believe, circulated any of his speeches in pamphlet form, but he was generous and hearty in his appreciation and circulation of those made by others.

He was a man of courage. When he served in this House, belonging to the old Whig party, the great radical abolitionist from the Ohio Ashtabula district was also a member. Anti-slavery sentiments in those days found little favor anywhere, and here encountered fiercest hate and frequent violence on the part of slaveholding Representatives. Mr. Giddings once told me that upon one occasion, when he had uttered some unwelcome truth about the institution of barbarous memory, one of these chivalric Representatives rushed toward him evidently bent on mischief, and that Foot at once sprang to his side ready to meet the aggressor. The promptness of this action and the firm port of Mr. Foot awed the would-be assassin and he retired to his seat. Nobody, said Mr. Giddings, could doubt the meaning of the one or the other.

The delicate as well as difficult duty of making up of the various committees of the Senate frequently fell to his lot, and it was always performed with great discretion and fairness. Here his modesty was apparent, for he never so carved as to leave the choicest parts to himself.

Mr. Foot was industrious, methodical, punctual to all appointments, and never postponed the work of to-day for the greater leisure of to-morrow. Whatever he aimed to do, he aimed to do well. He was proud of Vermont, loved her history, and wore her honors worthily. But he was not too proud to labor for the humblest of his constituents, and by his labors he added luster to his State and honor to the nation.

If it be that God loves those who are ready for His coming "in such an hour as ye think not," or those He takes while yet in the full enjoyment of all their strength and hopes, with mind and reputation as well as faith in the grace of God undimmed, then was Senator Foot fortunate as he was happy in the time of his death. Life was at its acme, and he filled as large a space in the world as his highest ambition had ever coveted. He had not tired himself, nor was the world tired by his presence, but he seemed to see, as with a heavenly vision, a welcome awaiting him in the new world to which he was hastening, and exclaimed, "I see it! I see it! The gates are wide open! Beautiful! Beautiful!"

Senator Foot was preëminently a large-hearted man, nursing no ill-natured jealousies in himself nor in others; far less did he indulge in any malice, and was the readiest man I have ever known to forget and forgive a seeming neglect or actual injury. Opponents never found his tongue lubricated by the serpent's poison, nor did friends ever find themselves "damned by faint praise," for he was lukewarm in nothing, but distributed praise and blame openly, manfully, and with a most refreshing unction. For his friends he was ready to make any sacrifices, and he obeyed their behests with a cordial alacrity never to be forgotten by those whom his position, official or other, enabled him to assist. Our volunteer soldiers and officers, so suddenly called from industrial avocations to put down the great rebellion, received his homage and tenderest solicitude. Of these he felt that the dead were all martyrs, the living all heroes, and his gratitude was unbounded. In his own State no public man ever possessed more of the affection of the people, as was sufficiently shown by his almost unanimous election by the Vermont Legislature for a third term to the Senate of the United States. He always met his colleagues with the most cordial salutations; no ill-wind ever rippled over the surface of their intercourse, and the most genial and affectionate relations were maintained up to the latest moments of his life. His loss to his family is irreparable, and so profound is their grief as to find no solace save in the contemplation of the sublimity of the dying Senator's Christian faith. The last utterances of great men are often treasured up and serve to prove the strength of some ruling, possibly petty, passion of the deceased, but rarely have the last words of any man been so fit to be reported to the world, or such as to be more likely to be forever engraven on the hearts of his friends, than those of the lamented Senator Foot. Without an enemy in the world, loving God and glowing with affection for all, and especially for those who visited him in his last hours, with eyes still beaming with all their wonted brilliancy, his unimpassioned words, so clearly articulated, so lovingly tendered, were well calculated to touch every heart by their wonderful pathos.

Honored Senator! true patriot! faithful friend! farewell!

The resolution was adopted; and the House accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BAXTER: The petition of H. Miller, and 40 others, citizens of Westfield, Orleans county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on foreign wool. Also, the petition of Stephen L. Leavitt, and 39 others, citizens of Albany, Orleans county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on wool.

Also, the memorial of P. T. Lunt, and 9 others, of Burlington, Vermont, asking relief from unreasonable taxation on iron manufactures.

By Mr. DARLING: The petition of brewers, for reduction in duty on barley imported from Canada.

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of John Crause, Jaycox Grier, and 70 others, citizens of Onondaga county, New York, asking legislation to regulate inter-State insurance.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The petition of certain citizens of the State of Minnesota, asking for an increase of the tariff upon wool.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Hon. N. B. Bradley, and 55 others, citizens of Bay City, Michigan, for a law regulating insurance in the States.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 13, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. RICHARD S. JAMES, of New Jersey.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, information in relation to the appointment of persons to office in that Department without taking the oath prescribed by law; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, a report of the Secretary of State in relation to the seizure and detention at New York of the steamship Meteor; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking Congress to assent to the route of the land-grant railroad from Portage to Bayfield, and thence to Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking Congress for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of so much of the Portage and Superior railroad as extends from Fond du Lac to Ripon, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for the establishment of a mail route from Sumner Post Office to Menomonee, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORTON presented a memorial of citizens of Mankato, Minnesota, praying for the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a petition of citizens of Spring Prairie, Wisconsin, praying for an increase of the duty on foreign wools; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, instructing the Senators and requesting the members of Congress from that State to procure the necessary legislation to change the route of a land-grant railroad from Portage to Superior. I present, also, another joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the section of the Portage and Superior railroad from Fond du Lac to Ripon. I ask to have these resolutions printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I desire to call the attention of the members of the Committee on Public Lands to the subject. As the land-grant bill for the State of Wisconsin passed Congress it designated alternatively three or four different points of departure, and that led to some difficulties in our State in disposing of the grant by the Legislature. The Legislature, however, have passed a law disposing of the grant, but in order to carry into effect the action of our Legislature it is necessary that Congress should grant them the privilege of making a deviation from the straight line. I call the attention of the gentlemen of the Committee on Public Lands to these resolutions, and hope that we shall get an early and favorable report on the subject.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NYE presented the petition of George E. Payne, of the parish of St. Charles, Louisiana, praying for compensation for losses sustained in the occupation and damage of his plantation by United States officers, and pay for property taken by troops under the command of General Butler; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of William H. Allen, late colonel of the first and one hundred and forty-fifth regiments of New York volunteers, praying for the payment of expenses incurred by him in raising those regiments, and for compensation for services while in command of the latter; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Catharine Ferguson, praying for compensation for injuries occasioned to her son, John Ferguson, on the 18th of November, 1863, in Alexandria, Virginia, by being run over by a United States military train, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 223) to revive and extend the provisions of an act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point upon the Mississippi opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, in Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi river, approved February 19, 1853, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, reported it with amendments.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of Daniel Winslow, reported it without amendment.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following report: The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867, having met, after free and full conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one, five, six, ten, and eleven, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their fourth amendment.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment, and also the clause of the bill to which it was attached, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

For the preservation and necessary repairs of the property of the United States at the Pensacola navy-yard, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

That the House agree to so much of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike out of said amendment the following words: "the same as those rates received at Boston, New York, and Washington," and agree to the matter proposed to be inserted by the House, and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from so much of their amendment to the ninth amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike out the second clause of said amendment; and that the Senate agree to so much of the amendment of the House to said Senate amendment as proposes to strike out the words, "foundry and," in the fourth clause of said amendment.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the twelfth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the sixth section of the bill in the following words: "if approved by the Secretary of the Navy,"

JAMES W. GRIMES,
E. D. MORGAN,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
N. P. BANKS,
J. F. FARNSWORTH,
CHARLES E. PHELPS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state to the Senate that the bill as agreed upon by the committees of conference is substantially as it passed the Senate, with the exception of two particulars. These are, first, an appropriation of $5,000 that was inserted by the House of Representatives, at the instance of the Navy Department, for the purpose of testing petroleum as a fuel, to which the committee of conference on the part of the Senate agree; and the other is the fourth amendment of the Senate, in regard to the purchase of Oakman & Eldridge's wharves, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, for which the Senate proposed to pay the sum of $105,000. From this amendment the committee of conference have recommended the Senate to recede. I desire to say in justice to myself and my colleagues on the committee, that we were unanimous in the conviction that the public interests really require that this purchase should be made. For myself I may say that I have not only examined the subject so far as it could be examined here in the Senate upon several former occasions, but I have personally examined the ground. I concur fully in the statement that was made the other day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] and by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] that the purchase ought to be made. Such is the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and of every Navy officer, so far as I know or am informed, who has been stationed at the Charlestown navy-yard during the last five years. The eminent officer now in command of that yard is very decided and emphatic on this behalf, and has never hesitated in expressing his conviction that the best interests of the service require that the purchase be at once made.

I believe that if an attempt shall be made to improve the yard, as it is proposed by those who oppose this purchase that it shall be improved, by building wharves out at the lower end of the ground now owned by the Government, which is near the delta created by the confluence of the waters of the Mystic and Charles rivers, it will have a tendency to destroy the harbor of Boston; and not only that, but it will cause the sediment to settle above those wharves, and destroy the only good landing or wharves we now have. But from the fact that a portion of the people of Charlestown are severely hostile to the purchase, and that the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, at the head of whom was the immediate representative of that locality, were unwilling to agree to it, the Senate committee thought that it was better not to jeopardize the passage of this bill on account of this purchase alone. All I have to say now is, that so far as I am concerned, if the people of Charlestown, or of Massachusetts, are not disposed to allow the Government to own the ground that it is necessary for it to have in order to carry on the public business, and to establish such a yard as the necessities of a great commercial and maritime nation require, I shall be willing, and shall recommend to the Senate, upon some future occasion, to remove the yard, to dispose of the property there, and to establish a yard at some point where we can get the necessary facilities.

The report was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 264) to grant certain privileges to the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 265) to protect the manufacturers of mineral waters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange or dispose of certain odd volumes of congressional documents, and other odd volumes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed on the 10th instant the following acts:

An act (S. No. 105) to grant the right of way to the Cascade Railroad Company through a military reserve in Washington Territory;

An act (S. No. 115) for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway;

An act (S. No. 117) for the relief of F. A. Patterson, late captain of the third Virginia cavalry; and

An act (S. No. 181) for the relief of Emma J. Hall.

DOCUMENTS TO JUDGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will proceed to the order of the day, which is the business reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that the order of the day for the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not during the morning hour, but if no other business intervenes the Chair will proceed with the special order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 172.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If it will lead to debate, I must object to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it will lead to debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 172) authorizing certain public documents to be distributed to the district and territorial judges of the United States.

The Committee on Printing reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line seven, after the word "Globe" to strike out the words, "and one copy of all books and documents on subjects of a general nature which may be printed by order of Congress, or of either House thereof," and to insert the words "hereafter printed;" so that the section will read:

That in addition to the books and documents now required by law to be furnished to the district judges and the judges of the territorial courts of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior shall mail, free of postage, to each of them one copy of the Congressional Globe hereafter printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will explain it. It is a bill to distribute to the district judges and judges of the territorial courts a copy of the Congressional Globe to be kept among the books and papers of their offices.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why should that be done?

Mr. ANTHONY. So that the judges in administering the laws may have all the light that may be thrown upon them by the debates in Congress. It seems to me there is no class—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend if the Delegates from the Territories do not get their portion of the Congressional Globe.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is generally a very large number in proportion to their population.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not merely for the territorial judges, but for the district judges. The district judges have not, by any provision of law, in the libraries belonging to them the Congressional Globe. The bill originally as it was referred to the committee provided for the furnishing to these judges a copy of all the books and documents of a general nature printed by Congress; but the committee have amended it by restricting it to the Congressional Globe.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see what is the use of giving them that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see of what use the Congressional Globe is to anybody, if it is not of use to the judges of the courts; and as the Congressional Globe has been printed lately, as I understand, with a number of speeches omitted and others altered, I do not know that there is a great deal of use in printing it at all. But if it is of use to anybody it is of use to the judges.

Mr. CONNESS. The Congressional Globe is an accessible book. There are a great many of them published, and I suppose they get such a distribution by all Senators and members of Congress that it is one of the most accessible books in all the libraries. I suppose there is scarcely a leading library in the country that does not contain it. In my State, young as it is, I have a list of fifty-three libraries, which run into nearly all the villages of the State, and I serve that list first, giving each a copy of the Congressional Globe, before I send it to anybody else. I apprehend that some such distribution is made, if not by all Senators, by some, and members of Congress; so that there is no book more easily obtained by the judges than the Congressional Globe. The State library of my State, which is located at the capital and is accessible to the courts, always contains more than one copy of it; and really I do not see the necessity for this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly the Globe is distributed to almost all the judges, but the copy they now receive belongs to them individually, and is not transmitted with the papers of their offices to their successors. The case is a very simple one. I have no desire about the matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope this bill will pass. I remember when I was one of the territorial judges of the Territory of Oregon that questions arose there under the donation law to that Territory, and it was necessary, in order to understand that law, to refer to the Congressional Globe and the debates that occurred upon the passage of the law, and at that time there was but one copy of the Congressional Globe in the Territory, and that was in the possession of the widow of the late Mr. Thurston, formerly a Delegate from that Territory to Congress. The necessity of having the Congress-sional Globe there at that time became evident, and I think the same necessity exists in all the Territories. If there is any officer of the Government who needs a copy of the Congressional Globe it seems to me it is the judge of the United States district court or of a court of a Territory, because in the interpretation of the laws passed by Congress it is necessary and advisable to refer to the debates which were had at the time the laws were passed. I think the judge should be furnished with a copy so that he can have it as a part of his library. The practice has been heretofore to send to these territorial judges large boxes of public documents, executive documents, Senate documents, and House documents that are of little or no value to him. One copy of the Congressional Globe would be of more value to a judge of a court than all the other public documents that are sent to him relating to the proceedings of Congress. I know from my own experience that a copy of the Congressional Globe will be of value to a judge in a Territory, and I hope that the bill will be adopted. It certainly will not involve any considerable expense, and I am sure it will be a great convenience to those who have the laws to administer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Printing to strike out the first section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line one, to strike out the words "and documents;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said books shall be the property of the United States, for the use of said judges and their successors.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any more propriety in furnishing the Congressional Globe to the district judges than I do of furnishing any law-book. They usually purchase their own libraries, and they can very easily purchase the Globes—there are plenty of them in the States—at a small expense if they want them. This idea of furnishing libraries, or giving books of any kind to the district judges, it strikes me is the beginning of a system—I do not suppose it would amount to much now—that may be abused and that ought not to be commenced. I have distributed large numbers of the Globe since I have been in Congress. I do not know whether I gave it to the district judge or not. If he wanted one he could have had it by intimating to me that he desired it. This proposition, like all others of the same sort, is merely an attempt to send something out, and we shall have to buy these copies at the public expense of the publisher. If you are going to begin this system, you might as well go back and do the whole thing at once, for the Globe does not cover a very large portion of the laws, and take the Annals of Congress, Gales & Seaton's Register, and then the Congressional Globe, and give them the whole, so that they may have them all from the commencement. If you intend to commence this system you might as well put them all in. I doubt very much the expediency or the propriety of it. I shall vote against it myself.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator misapprehends the bill in one respect. The bill, as it is amended, only proposes to give them the Congressional Globe hereafter printed. It is not intended to give them full sets.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they want the Globes hereafter printed, each Senator receives something like ninety copies every session—

Mr. CONNESS. Ninety-four.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Each Senator receives ninety-four copies, and each Representative gets twenty or thirty copies—

Mr. SHERMAN. Twenty-four.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And it is perfectly easy for members of Congress to furnish both the territorial and district judges with all the copies of the Globe that may be wanted. They will be glad to find somebody that will take them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not object to having the bill so amended as to deduct the amount furnished the judges from the copies furnished the Senate. I think it is desirable that these Globes should be in the offices of the district judges, to be transmitted to their successors. Undoubtedly, every judge gets the Globe, but when he goes out of his office he takes that with him, with the rest of his private documents. However, if the bill does not meet the approbation of the Senate, I will not press it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That object may be secured by giving these copies to the district court library; but I do not see any necessity for buying so large a number for them when we have so many to throw away.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see why it is not just as reasonable to furnish the judges—I am speaking particularly at this time on behalf of the territorial judges—a copy of the Congressional Globe as it is to furnish them with copies of the other public documents, and with a copy of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. These are all furnished to the judges free of expense. The public documents that are sent to the judges are of very little value. The reports of the Supreme Court of course are of value; but there is no public document of a legislative nature that will be of so much value to the judges of these courts as a copy of the Congressional Globe, because it is frequently necessary to consult the Globe in discussing questions of law. I understand that Delegates from the Territories are furnished like members with a distributive share of the Congressional Globe, but I am confident that very few of them ever reach the Territories; and there is no probability, unless some particular provision is made, that these judges will be furnished with the Globe. I think an expenditure of money could not be more wisely made than to supply judges with the Globe.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there is any serious objection to this bill I will consent to its going over, and I will prepare an amendment that the Globes furnished to the district judges shall be deducted from the quota furnished the Senate. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ELISHA W. DUNN.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 202, for the relief of Elisha W. Dunn, a paymaster in the United States Navy.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I call for the regular order of the day if the morning business is over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the morning hour has expired the business referred to by the Senator from Indiana will come up; but in the opinion of the Chair matters of this sort are in order, subject, of course, to the vote of the Senate, until one o'clock.

The motion of Mr. CRAGIN was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Elisha W. Dunn, a paymaster in the United States Navy, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of the accounts of Elisha W. Dunn, a paymaster in the United States Navy, to receive and allow, where the proper vouchers cannot be obtained, statements verified by his oath, or such other satisfactory evidence as he may present, of all expenditures made by him for the Government, or losses sustained by him in consequence of the destruction by fire of the money, papers, and property of the United States in his charge on board of the United States naval wharf-boat at Mound City, Illinois, at the burning of that vessel on the 1st of June, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the following bill and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 229) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia;

A joint resolution (S. No. 45) protesting against pardons by foreign Governments of persons convicted of infamous offenses on condition of emigration to the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) for the temporary relief of the destitute people in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue cutters.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the concurrent resolution of the Senate, prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other intoxicating liquors about the Capitol building and grounds, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Martha McCook, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 199) to establish the collection district of Port Huron, the collection district of Michigan, the collection district of Montana and Idaho, and to change the name of the collection district of Penobscot;

A bill (S. No. 31) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

A bill (S. No. 229) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia;

A bill (H. R. No. 150) for the relief of the administrators and securities of Almon W. Babbitt, late secretary of Utah;

A bill (H. R. No. 471) to provide that the "Soldier's Individual Memorial" shall be carried through the mails at the usual rate of printed matter;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) protesting against pardons by foreign Governments of persons convicted of infamous offenses on condition of emigration to the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) for the temporary relief of destitute people in the District of Columbia.

ABSENCE OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 32.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 32) to prevent the absence of territorial officers from their official duties. It provides that no person in any Territory now in office, or who may hereafter be in office by appointment of the President, after he enters upon the discharge of his official duties, shall be absent from the Territory of which he is an officer for more than thirty days at any one time, and no leave of absence shall be necessary or granted to any such officer. No officer absent for a longer time is to be entitled to any salary during his absence, and it is to be the duty of the President, upon a willful violation of this law by any such officer, to remove him forthwith from office.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that come from a committee? It appears to me to be very stringent legislation that no leave of absence shall be granted.

Mr. BROWN. Does it come from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. From the Committee on Territories, I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. Willful absence is punishable—

Mr. GRIMES. Here it is:

That no person in any Territory now in office, or who may hereafter be in office by appointment of the President, after he enters upon the discharge of his official duties, shall be absent from the Territory of which he is an officer for more than thirty days at any one time, and no leave of absence shall be necessary or granted to any such officer.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is independent of the cause of the absence; the illness of his family may cause him to remain away from his post. It appears to me to be rather stringent legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The object of this bill is to prevent officers of the Territories from absenting themselves from the performance of their official duties. I do not know how it may be with the Territories on this side of the Rocky mountains, but on the Pacific coast I know that this has grown into a very great abuse, and in most of the Territories there a very large portion of the territorial officers are absent from their duties. Sometimes the Governor is away, with the secretary, and several of the judges; and in two or three of those Territories they have not been able to have any courts for a year at a time on account of the absence of the judges; and it becomes necessary that the law should require them to remain there where they can attend to the duties of their respective offices.

The first section provides that an officer may be absent from the Territory for thirty days, and it shall not be necessary for him to obtain any leave in order to be absent during that time. It further provides that no leave of absence shall be granted to any officer; and the object of that provision is to prevent these territorial officers from obtaining a leave upon some excuse which may be made to the Department. Now the practice is to send a telegram to some one of the Departments here or to the President asking for leave of absence for six months, generally with the object of visiting Washington or the eastern States, and so far as I know, that leave of absence is generally granted. Some, however, leave and come here and obtain this leave of absence after they arrive here; they come without any leave, and then after they arrive here they apply for a leave of absence, and as a general thing it is granted.

I do not see why if a person accepts an office in a Territory—and the applicants are numerous and clamorous for these places—he should not remain there and discharge his duty; but the practice has become almost universal now that as soon as an officer obtains the appointment and enters upon the discharge of the duties of his office and the salary begins to accrue to him, then finding it unpleasant, perhaps, to remain there, he takes occasion to leave to visit Washington, to visit the States and be absent six months or a year from the Territory, and so the people are without any organized government in many cases. This is a particular hardship when the judges of the courts are absent. I do not wish to mention particular Territories or the names of persons, but it is within my knowledge that in several Territories there has been practically no territorial government on account of the absence of territorial officers, and the object of this bill is to require them to remain there.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose they do not remain, what is to be done?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then they are to be removed from office by the terms of this bill. If an officer of a Territory is willfully absent from the discharge of his duties for more than thirty days at any one time, it is made the duty of the President to remove him forthwith from office. He is permitted under this bill to go away and be absent thirty days at any one time, to make a visit anywhere he pleases, and extend the visit for thirty days; but it is impossible for justice to be administered by the judges of these Territories or the business of the territorial governments to be conducted if the officers there are allowed whenever they see proper to leave and come here to Washington or to the States, because it takes six months or a year generally to perform that journey, and during that time the people are left without any officers to discharge the duties necessary to be discharged for the interest of the people. I am not particular about the phraseology of the bill or about its terms, but I think it is desirable that some such law as this should be passed in order to abolish and remove this abuse.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that I understand this bill, but if I do understand it the result will be that if an officer of one of the Territories is now in this city or in New York, or elsewhere outside of the Territory upon business, under a permit or a leave granted by a superior officer in this city, and if he has been here thirty days, he is to be turned out of office. It is retrospective.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Or he is to be turned out if he does not get home in thirty days.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt that something ought to be done on this subject. I am as conscious as the Senator from Oregon is that great injustice has been done to the people of the Territories by the absence of the territorial officers. I have been informed of cases where the judges have been absent nine months out of the twelve. But it seems to me that this is rather a sweeping law. Suppose the secretary of the Territory of Idaho is instructed by the General Assembly of that Territory to procure the laws of the General Assembly to be printed at the end of the session. He cannot print them in Idaho; he must necessarily come to some of the States. He must supervise the matter, attend to making a critical index, and seeing that the printing of the laws is done correctly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then he is not absent from his duties.

Mr. GRIMES. He is absent from the Territory, and the provision of the bill refers to absence from the Territory and not to absence from duty. In that case he must be put out of office at once.

Mr. NESMITH. As my colleague has already stated, a very great abuse has grown up on account of the absence of officers from the Territories. I think, however, it is mostly confined to judicial officers. I know that judges in Washington and Idaho—and I have heard similar complaints from Montana—have been absent a good deal. But I think the provisions of this bill are a little too stringent. It sometimes becomes necessary that territorial officers should visit Washington city. I know that a few days ago a dispatch was sent to an officer in Idaho requiring his presence in this city, not on private business but on business connected with the Indian department in relation to treaties. Under this bill, however, notwithstanding the fact that he has been telegraphed for to come to Washington in the discharge of his official duty, he is liable to be dismissed for complying with the order of his superior. I prefer that the bill should limit leaves of absence in some way, and I think that power is tolerably safe where it is lodged now, with the President and heads of Departments. I know they have recently become very stringent in the exercise of the power of granting permission, and have refused leave of absence in several cases. But if this bill is passed in its present form, if an officer is ordered here on duty—and it frequently becomes necessary to order officers of the Indian department here from the Territories—he is not only liable to lose his salary but to be dismissed from his office. I have no objection to the bill if it be confined to judicial officers; but if it is to extend to all territorial officers, I should be glad to see some modification of it, though I admit there has been much cause of complaint on account of the absence of territorial officers from their Territories.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the bill will be laid over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not particular, as I before stated, as to the phraseology employed in this bill, but I am satisfied that if the bill provides that leave of absence may be granted as it is now granted by the President or by the heads of the different Departments, the bill will be of little or no value. I do not object to any exception that may be made where an exception may be supposed to be necessary; but so far as I know the applications that are made by these officers are universally granted. There may have been an application denied, but not to my knowledge, and I know that in very many cases officers leave their positions in the Territories and come here to Washington, and then solicit their friends and those whom they suppose to have influence with the proper Department to apply for leave of absence, and upon application and by importunity this leave of absence is obtained. I think that there ought to be some restriction upon that, so that an officer sending a telegram here to Washington containing some representation that his absence is necessary shall not thereupon obtain leave of absence, because the President or the head of a Department may not be advised as to the necessity of his presence in the Territory. The object of the bill is to reach that mischief as well as the other, and I concur in what my colleague says that great evil has grown out of the absence of judicial officers from the Territories.

As to the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa that the secretary might necessarily be absent to attend to the printing of the laws, let me say that may be done, without the presence of the secretary, and is generally done outside of the Territory without his presence to supervise the printing. I am willing if it is desired, that the bill shall go over, and that some amendments shall be proposed or suggested if Senators are not satisfied with the bill in its present form.

Mr. CONNESS. From one point of view the proposition now before the Senate interests me considerably; it calls my attention to the fact that to a very considerable extent the Territories of the United States are governed by appointees selected in the East from superannuated politicians, men either found unfit at home to fill high public station, or who have been in public station and cut no considerable or creditable figure in it. Such men have been very commonly selected and sent as a plague upon the people of the Territories of the United States—a people as a general rule the most virtuous, the most courageous, the most useful in the Republic. They go out frequently from comfortable and compensating industries inspired by the spirit of adventure and by the hope of making new homes in regions offering better inducements for success. They reduce the forest and the wilderness to civilization and use. They are generally men of marked intelligence, fine types of the American character, the men who have taken empire westward and who are now rolling back civilization upon the East, and the very highest type of moral and political philosophy reduced to practice, from the ocean that bounds this continent on the west.

The President pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the order of the day, being bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, assigned by special order for this day.

Mr. CONNESS. If there is no haste in calling up those bills, I should like to proceed for a few moments.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to pass all those bills to-day; there are a great many of them.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that I will not occupy five minutes.

The President pro tempore. The Senator from California may proceed by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I have more than once called attention in the Senate to this practice. The abuses which result from it, and which are sought to be corrected by the bill now before us, arise in a great measure from the fact that the parties selected to govern and hold the high places in the Territories are not selected, as they should be, from the body of those courageous men whom I have described, that go out and pioneer that country and undertake its reduction to civilized purposes. I do not expect by anything that I shall say here to be able to correct this general, as I think, perversion of power and misuse of power; but it is clear that if the selections were made with more care and with more regard to the persons to be governed, namely, the inhabitants of the Territories, the persons in these places would be at home, they would not be running into the cities of the East; they would not be coming back to see their friends, and to exhibit themselves as returned Governors and judges, to be feasted and toasted, and exhibiting rich specimens selected from the ores of those new Territories, talking often very learnedly and very deceptively to the eastern people and the eastern mind about the riches of those countries of which they know little; of which practically, they know nothing.

These, and many abuses like them, would have an end if care was observed in selecting the men who are to govern these people and the men who are to administer the laws among them from themselves. It is not, Mr. President, for the want of talent there that their Governors and administrators of the laws among them are selected elsewhere. We have a case now in point; I think it is worthy of attention. We have sent a soldier out very recently to fill the office of secretary of a Territory in the West. He finally, as the law provides, fills the office of Governor pro tempore during the absence of that functionary. He has given new administration in that Territory; he by his acts has released from confinement men guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and the population, maddened at the absurd pretensions and assumptions, have followed a criminal and hung him to the next tree. This is the administration of law that is now going on in one of the Territories!

I hope without extending these remarks, which if time permitted I would do, that some measure of this kind carefully prepared will pass and become a law, and that these gentlemen selected and sent out into these places of honor, and to them frequently of profit, (for some of them go further than legitimate ends in reaching profit,) will be required to make their domicile at least, or yield the offices that in many instances they so discreditably fill.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, if this bill is to pass—I do not know whether the vote is to be taken this morning—

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I must object to further discussion of the bill, and call for the order of the day.

The President pro tempore. The order of the day is now in order, and any further discussion can only be had by unanimous consent.

Mr. POMEROY. I had an amendment to propose to meet the very case submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I hope it will go over.

The President pro tempore. Bills reported from the Committee on Pensions are the special order of the day. The Chair will, however, first dispose of some business on his table, by the indulgence of the Senate.

POST OFFICE FUNDS.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other liquors in the Capitol building and grounds; the amendment being to insert the words "and other public buildings" after the word "building" where it occurs in the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision ought to be limited certainly to Washington, for there are public buildings and grounds in various parts of the country which would be covered unless some limitation were made.

Mr. CONNESS. In addition to that, I beg to suggest that the resolution as it now stands extends the jurisdiction of the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives over other public buildings beside the Capitol, evidently with impropriety. I suggest that the amendment had better be referred to a committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. And it applies not only here but to all public buildings all over the country. Is it expected that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives are to make a journey of investigation on the subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator from California propose to refer the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the better way is just to disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives. Then if they ask for a committee of conference the matter can be arranged.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator from Ohio: the better way is to send it back.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and the Chair will put the question affirmatively.

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague, who introduced the resolution, is now absent, and I hope nothing will be done by which the resolution shall suffer. I agree, therefore, with my friend from Ohio that we had better disagree to the House amendment and send the resolution back.

Mr. POMEROY. Would it be in order to disagree with the amendment of the House of Representatives with an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be put affirmatively, Will the Senate concur? A negative vote amounts to a non-concurrence.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we ought to apply the principle of the confiscation act to this liquor traffic. It is a public enemy, and we ought to have the principle of search, seizure, and confiscation applied to it; but I shall not undertake to move an amendment now.

The question being put, the amendment of the House of Representatives was non-concurred in.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I propose first to take up the bill (S. No. 22) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the first in order on the Calendar of the bills reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. In that case there is an adverse report, and in order to get the bill off the Calendar I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RATE OF PENSION.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (S. No. 131) supplementary to the several acts in relation to pensions was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is provided by the bill that from and after its passage every non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, or private of the Army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, and every warrant or petty officer, musician, seaman, ordinary seaman, flotilla-man, marine, clerk, landsman, pilot, or other person in the Navy or Marine corps, who has been disabled by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of his duty, or who may hereafter be disabled in such service, and who is not now entitled by law to a greater sum, shall, upon making due proof according to such forms and regulations as are or may be required by or in pursuance of law, be placed upon the list of invalid pensions of the United States, at the rate of twelve dollars per month, to be governed by the same limitations and restrictions as are now prescribed by an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The subject-matter of this bill is embraced in a general bill from the House of Representatives with this difference: that this bill proposes a general increase of pensions from eight dollars to twelve dollars a month, while the other bill proposes to increase the pension for greater disabilities and to leave the pension as it is for ordinary pensions. I propose to take up the general House bill, and I move, therefore, that this bill lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES YOULY.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move next to take up House bill No. 218.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youldy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Charles Youldy, of Dunkirk, Chautauqua county, New York, late private of company D, seventy-second regiment New York volunteers, of \$135 33 $\frac{1}{3}$, being at the rate of five dollars per month, from the 25th day of November, 1862, to the 27th day of February, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN HETH.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move next to take up the bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, in the State of Indiana, who was killed by the rebel Morgan's men, while resisting their advance upon Corydon, Indiana, upon the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 9th day of July, 1863, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESTRICTIONS UPON PENSION PAYMENTS.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 46) removing the restrictions upon the payment of pensions to certain persons while in the service of the United States, which had been reported upon adversely by the Committee on Pensions.

The resolution provides that the act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865, shall not hereafter be so construed as to deprive invalid pensioners, or the widows or heirs of any persons who have served in the Army or Navy during the late war, of the pension to which they are entitled by reason of holding any office under the Government, in cases where the compensation received from the United States as pay or salary does not exceed $800 per annum.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The subject-matter of this joint resolution is already contained in a general bill pending before the Senate, and I therefore move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBERT NEVINS.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins. By its terms the Secretary of the Interior will be directed to place the name of Albert Nevins, late a private in company K, ninety-second regiment New York State volunteers, upon the list of pensioners at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, in lieu of eight dollars per month heretofore allowed him; to commence on the passage of the act and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORDELIA MURRAY.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray. The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Cordelia Murray, widow of George W. Murray, the pension granted to George W. Murray by an act of Congress approved December 20, 1864, entitled "An act for the relief of George W. Murray."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether there is a report in this case.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There are reports in all these cases. A House or Senate report accompanies every bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember that formerly when we used to fall on a day like this somebody who guarded the Treasury pretty well would insist upon the reading of the report in each case.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no objection to that. There is a report in every case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So that we might see whether they were right or not. It was found to be pretty difficult to get a good many of these bills through when they were understood. I do not feel inclined to take that office, but I wish to ask my friend from Indiana whether all these cases which he is calling up have been very critically and carefully examined in the committee of which he is the chairman.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. We have examined every case and every voucher and every paper, and the whole committee have reported upon them. We have been some two or three weeks trying to get these bills all right and in ship-shape.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose, as these are special acts granting pensions, that the cases do not come under any general law.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. They do not come under any general law; otherwise, they would not be here at all. I will ask the Secretary to read the report in this case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report. Has it been printed?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All these reports ought to be printed and laid on our tables, so that we may have a chance to read them.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That has been done, I think, in every single instance with regard to Senate bills. This is a House report, and I do not know whether it was ordered to be printed or not. I do not think it was.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have noticed that some of these reports in these pension cases have been laid on our tables. Has that been followed as a general rule?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir, always.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report in this case.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House of Representatives, from which it appears that by an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of George W. Murray," approved December 2, 1864, the Commissioner of Pensions was directed to pay to him the pension to which he was entitled by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1837, entitled "An act for the more equitable administration of the Navy pension fund." After the passage of that act by the House, and while it was pending in the Senate, Mr. Murray died, leaving a widow and several children in destitute circumstances. The committee therefore report a bill granting to Mrs. Murray the pension which her husband would have drawn had he lived until the passage of the act referred to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the bill read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the bill stands it might continue this pension indefinitely. I should think it hardly safe to pass the bill in its present form. If it is only intended to give her what he would have been entitled to receive up to the time of his death, had the bill passed before, it seems to me the bill does not carry out that idea.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I will send for the act referred to in the report and see exactly what the terms of that act are. I think, under the circumstances, the widow and children of this George W. Murray ought to have the benefit of this pension. The bill can be postponed for the present.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is one of those cases where we can learn nothing from having the bill read.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask that the bill may lie over until I can get the act for the benefit of this Mr. Murray and see what the terms of that act were.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside by common consent.

CATHERINE MOCK.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of Catherine Mock.

The bill provides for placing upon the pension-roll the name of Catherine Mock, of the city of Baltimore, widow of William H. Mock, who was ordnance sergeant, and died, at or near Fort Mifflin, in 1837, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of this act and continue during her natural life.

The Committee on Pensions proposed to amend the bill by striking out the words "from and after the passage of this act" and inserting "from the 1st day of May, 1865."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Stockton from the Committee on Pensions on the 23d of March last:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 219, entitled "An act for the relief of Catherine Mock," respectfully report:

That it appears from the evidence before the committee that Catherine Mock is the widow of Mr. William H. Mock, who served with fidelity as a private soldier during the Florida war; that he reenlisted and was made ordnance sergeant at Fort Mifflin, on the Delaware, in 1836; that in November, 1837, he was drowned while attempting to cross the river to obtain supplies for the post. It further appears that said widow is now more than seventy years of age, afflicted, helpless, and destitute of all means of support; that it is barely possible she will live three months to enjoy the pension provided by the bill.

The committee think that the pension should be granted from the date when the claim came prominently before Congress. They therefore report the bill back with the following amendment: strike out in line nine, after the word "from," the words "and after the passage of this act," and insert the following words in place thereof, "the 1st day of May, 1865."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That amendment is simply this: the bill as it passed the House granted a pension to Mrs. Mock from and after the passage of this act; but it was thought by our committee—the report was made by Mr. Stockton—that the pension should commence from the time she filed her papers claiming the pension.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire why she is not entitled to a pension under the general law with reference to pensions? Why does she not come within that law?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He was not killed in battle, as the Senator would have noticed if he had listened to the reading of the report.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I noticed that. Must they be killed in battle?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This man was drowned. A person must be killed in battle or die from wounds or disease contracted in the line of his duty in order to be entitled to a pension under the general pension law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless we are to establish a new principle that is to apply to all these cases, the other reason in the report is hardly one that can be given; and that is, that she is aged and infirm and needs this pension. That would take out of the Treasury in all cases money for those who happen to be infirm and aged. I should like to know of the chairman if the committee have established the principle that in all cases where the widows of soldiers are left in needy circumstances they are to receive a pension.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The committee have established no such principle; but they have established in this bill this principle: that if a man is drowned while he is in the service, and in the discharge of his duty, he is entitled to a pension, as much so as though he had been shot down in the face of the enemy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Have you confined your bills to cases of that description?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly we do. We do not go into general charities at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to it; but I think the last reason given in the report ought to be omitted, because it might make a bad precedent.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARTHA STEVENS.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (S. No. 237) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior, according to the bill, is to place the name of Mrs. Martha Stevens, widow of John F. Stevens, late deputy provost marshal of the fourth congressional district of the State of Indiana, on the pension-roll, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, to commence from the 10th day of June, 1863, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There is a report in that case. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, on the 2d of April:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Martha Stevens, widow of the late John F. Stevens, of Greensburg, Indiana, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That John F. Stevens, late of Greensburg, Indiana, (the husband of the petitioner,) was in the month of June, 1863, in the employ of the Government as deputy provost marshal of Decatur county, in the fourth congressional district of said State; that he, as said deputy provost marshal, was ordered to proceed to Rush county, in said district, in command of a small detachment of troops to enforce the enrollment in said county, where there had been threatened resistance to its execution. On the 10th day of June, 1863, he proceeded to the execution of his orders, and while in the performance of his duties was fired upon by parties concealed in a wheat-field and instantly killed.

Under the above circumstances the committee believe that the petitioner should be placed on the roll of pensioners, and therefore report a bill for her relief.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The reason of this special legislation is that provost marshals were not embraced in any of our pension laws. It was an office unknown at the time they were enacted. This man was killed in the discharge of his duties, and one of his murderers died in jail. The proof of all the circumstances is very clear.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel a sympathy for this case, and shall vote for this bill, but I am not satisfied with the statement made by my colleague. I was attorney for the parties who were arrested on the charge of this murder, and I think I am justified in saying that my colleague is mistaken in saying that they were the murderers. Who the murderers were is a thing entirely unknown in that community, and if the case had come to trial I expected most confidently the acquittal of the parties who were accused.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Of course I receive that explanation; the Senator lives in the immediate neighborhood; but there is no doubt about the facts in the case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no doubt about the fact that Mr. Stevens, while in the discharge of his duty as provost marshal in that district, was shot, without any justification whatever. He was a kind man, and I never heard that he abused the powers of his office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the rate of the pension to be given his widow?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. His rank in the Army Register is that of captain, and we propose to give the widow the pension of a captain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. AMARILLA COOK.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (S. No. 238) granting a pension to Mrs. Amarilla Cook, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The name of Mrs. Amarilla Cook, widow of John B. Cook, late deputy provost marshal of the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Ohio, is by this bill to be placed on the pension-roll, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, to commence from the 5th day of March, 1865, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is that for?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The circumstances in this case are very similar to the circumstances in the case just passed. Mr. Cook was a provost marshal, and was assassinated at his own door, and two of his murderers have since been hanged for his murder. The proof is all clear, and the committee thought that his widow was entitled to a pension. The pension is the pension of a captain.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there a report?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary then read the following report, made by Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, on the 2d of April:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Cambridge, Guernsey county, Ohio, praying that a pension be granted to Mrs. Amarilla Cook, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That Mrs. Amarilla Cook is the widow of John B. Cook, who was a deputy provost marshal of the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Ohio, and who was murdered at Cambridge, Ohio, on the 5th day of March, 1865, by Hiram Oliver and John W. Hartup, two deserters from the military service of the United States, whom he had attempted to arrest, and who went to his house and shot him down almost in the presence of his family, for which crime they were convicted and executed at Camp Chase on the 5th day of September, 1863.

The committee, believing that no more meritorious case has come before them, therefore report a bill for her relief.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He was not in the execution of his duty at the time he was murdered. The report states that these parties went to his house and shot him.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The report states, if the Senator noticed it, that he had undertaken to arrest two deserters but had not succeeded in making the arrest, and they subsequently proceeded to his house and shot him down, shortly after dark. The fact of his being in the discharge of his duty was surely the cause of his death, for he had gone there for the purpose of arresting them. We thought that he was clearly in the line of his duty, and that his widow ought to receive a pension.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really think it is carrying the matter to a very considerable extent to grant pensions in any of these cases. Provost marshals can hardly be considered in the military service. They are civil officers to a very great degree. Here was a man who, being an officer, and perhaps because he was an officer, was murdered, but not while he was attempting to discharge his duties. Perhaps he was murdered to prevent his attempting it at some future time. This is establishing something of a precedent. We have not given pensions, in any case that I know of, for civil service. I should like to know exactly how these provost marshals stood. Were they mustered into the service as military officers?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Provost marshals, under the conscription act, were mustered into the military service of the United States, with the rank of captain, always wore the uniform, were always subject to orders, and they were charged with the execution of this conscription law. That was a part of their peculiar duties. It was also made their duty to arrest all deserters. Mr. Cook had gone from this village of Cambridge, I think, to arrest two deserters, but had not succeeded in their arrest. I believe they resisted the arrest. He had returned to his house, and shortly afterward they followed him there and shot him down at his own door, and were afterward hanged for the murder. I do not think any clearer case of merit will ever be presented to the Senate. I think his death was clearly occasioned by the discharge of his duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not disputing that; but I will ask the Senator how many of these cases he has got.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. These are the only two that I know of in the United States. They were the only two brought before us, and are almost identical in character.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You say that this man was mustered into the military service?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; and they were charged expressly with the execution of this law. That was their express duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection to it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I may be incorrect in the fact that they were actually mustered, but they were commissioned and ordered to report to the nearest military commander.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I suppose they are to be considered as in the discharge of military duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time; and passed.

MRS. ALTAZERA L. WILLCOX.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Willcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York.

The bill provides for placing the name of Altazera L. Willcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York, widow of William Willcox, late a private in company B, in the one hundred and fourteenth regiment New York volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of the act, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House of Representatives, from which it appears that William Willcox, the late husband of the petitioner, enlisted in the one hundred and fourteenth regiment New York infantry volunteers, and was regularly mustered into the service of the United States on the 11th of August, 1862, to serve three years or during the war, in the town of Norwich, Chenango county, New York. He served with his regiment until some time in the spring of 1864, when he was sent to the general hospital at the barracks near New Orleans in consequence of chronic diarrhoea, which disease was contracted while in the line of duty. On the 23d of May, 1864, he received a sick furlough, and embarked the same day on the Government steamer Pocahontas for his home in New York. On the night of June 1, 1864, the steamer Pocahontas collided with the steamer City of Bath off the coast of New Jersey, and sunk, carrying down with her some forty persons, among whom was William Willcox. It also appears that the petitioner and William Willcox were married to each other on the 12th of September, 1848. In view of these facts the committee recommend the passage of a bill granting a pension to the petitioner at the rate of eight dollars per month to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HOFFMAN.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 265) granting a pension to John Hoffman. By its provisions John Hoffman is to be placed on the pension-roll; at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of the act, and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House of Representatives. It appears from the evidence that the petitioner enlisted in the United States marine service at Philadelphia on the 16th day of August, 1827, and was placed on board the United States schooner Grampus, which vessel sailed soon after for the Gulf of Mexico. While serving on the Grampus at Pensacola the petitioner appears to have been taken to the hospital on two occasions for disease contracted in the line of his duty, and was finally discharged at New York on the 6th day of May, 1830, upon the recommendation of his commanding officer. It is alleged, and well established by the testimony of respectable persons who have known him for a long time, that he never recovered from the disease contracted on ship-board. The petitioner is aged and in very destitute circumstances. The committee therefore report a bill for his relief and recommend its passage.

Mr. GRIMES. Do you not propose to pay him this pension out of the naval pension fund?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. No, sir; the bill merely directs the Secretary of the Interior to place his name on the pension-rolls, and he is to be paid out of the general fund.

Mr. GRIMES. We are very much obliged to the Senator. There is about eleven or twelve million dollars in the naval pension fund, and it could well afford to pay this pension.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no doubt about that, but the difficulty we had on the subject was that he is not now in the naval service.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought he was on board the Grampus?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He had been discharged for a great many years from the Navy, and was not in the Navy when he made his application, and I supposed we ought to put it on the general fund. I have no objection to letting it be paid out of the naval fund if the Senator will move that amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. How long ago did he contract this disease?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Some thirty years ago.

Mr. GRIMES. What was the disease?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The report will show.

Mr. GRIMES. It does not state what it was. I ask for the reading of that portion of the report again.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"While serving on the Grampus at Pensacola, the petitioner appears to have been admitted to the hospital on two occasions of diseases contracted while in the line of his duty."

Mr. JOHNSON. That does not state what the disease was.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The papers in the case state it. It was not a very genteel disease, but a very disagreeable one. We did not think it necessary to specify it in the report.

Mr. GRIMES. Was it contracted in the line of his duty?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; when changing the cables.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really think this bill ought not to pass. It is a very old affair.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There seems to be some difficulty about the bill, and I move that it be laid aside for the present until I get one of the New York Senators to look into it, and shall call it up some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

AGNES W. LAUGHLIN.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move now to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 241.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Commissioner of Pensions to enroll Agnes W. Laughlin, widow of William Laughlin, deceased, late a private in company C, third Indiana cavalry, as entitled to a pension from the 1st of January, 1865.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Let the Secretary read the report.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, by which it appears that William Laughlin was a private in company C of the third Indiana cavalry; in December, 1864, he was in actual service and sick in hospital at New Orleans, and was ordered to be transferred to a hospital in Indiana. A short furlough was granted him, and he went on board the United States vessel North America, to proceed to New York city. There were about seven hundred soldiers on board of this steamer for this trip; but before she reached her destined port she sunk, and most of the soldiers, including Laughlin, perished. His widow, under these circumstances, applies for a pension, and the committee think the case meritorious.

Mr. GRIMES. Is not the Secretary of the Interior the officer whom we direct to pay pensions?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. I see that the bill is directed to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to amend the bill by substituting "the Secretary of the Interior" instead of "the Commissioner of Pensions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I observe that by an oversight the bill contains no limitation as to the duration of the pension. I move to amend the bill by adding the words "to continue during her widowhood."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

ISABELLA FOGG.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move now to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Isabella Fogg, of the State of Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Isabella Fogg on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of the act and to continue for her natural life, she having been totally disabled while acting as nurse on board the United States hospital boat near Louisville, in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has there been any limitation in the bills we have been passing confining the pensions to the widowhood of the pensioners?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There is that limitation in the bills generally; but it is not applicable to this case. The case is an exceedingly meritorious one. This lady nursed through the whole war without compensation, and her health was entirely broken down. She has letters from General Grant, General Sherman, General Meade, and all the commanding officers, recommending her as a most estimable lady of the highest character. The report of physicians is that she will probably not draw the pension six months.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. EMERANCE GOULER.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its provisions the Secretary of the Interior will be directed to place the name of Mrs. Emerance Gouler, widow of Charles Gouler, late a private in company F, ninth New Hampshire volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from the passage of the bill and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, which was made by Mr. LANE, of Indiana, on the 10th instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Emerance Gouler, have had the same under consideration, and report:

It appears from the evidence in this case that Charles Gouler, the husband of the petitioner, was a private in company F, ninth regiment New Hampshire volunteers, and was admitted to Satterlee United States general hospital, Pennsylvania, on the 28th of May, 1864, suffering from fever. That on the 8th of October following he received a pass from said hospital to leave the premises for a few hours, and that no information was afterward received concerning him until November 29, 1864, when it was stated by soldiers that he had been drowned. Upon an investigation by a coroner over the body of a soldier found in the Delaware river at Pine street wharf, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, October 14, 1864, he was identified by the pass and other papers found on the body.

The committee are of opinion that this is a meritorious case, and that under the circumstances the petitioner should receive a pension. They therefore report a bill for her relief.

Mr. JOHNSON. How came he to be drowned?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He was in hospital and received a sick leave to go out a few hours into the city, and never was heard of any more until he was found in the Delaware river and identified by the passes on his person. Nobody can tell how he came into the river.

Mr. GRIMES. What was the verdict of the coroner's jury?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The verdict of the coroner's jury identified the body as that of the soldier who had left the hospital, and gave his name. He was identified by the passes on his person.

Mr. JOHNSON. He was not drowned because he was a soldier.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He was not drowned because he was a soldier, but he had received his furlough from his commanding officer, in hospital, to go away for a few hours on sick leave. He was clearly in the service of the country; for we have always regarded men on furlough as continuing in the service. These are the facts of the case. The Senate can do with the bill just as they choose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This bill ought not to be passed, I think.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This is a pension to the widow; we think the man was drowned in the line of his duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He might have committed suicide, and in that way deprived the Government willfully of his services.

• Mr. LANE, of Indiana. He was in the service of the country until he was discharged. While he was on furlough he was in the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He might have got drunk while on furlough.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That may be true. These facts can never be explained further than the report goes. I think it a clear case for a pension. The committee were unanimous, and I believe the committee of the House have also agreed to report a bill in this case.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I believe that by law where a soldier absent on sick leave or on furlough comes to his death his widow is entitled to a pension. This case differs from that. It was not a case of sick leave or furlough, but it was a mere permission for a convalescent to leave the hospital for a few hours. He did so and did not return. Some eight or ten days after his body was found floating in the Delaware river. The pass and other papers in his possession fully identified him as the man. There were no signs of violence on his body, and it may have been a case of accidental drowning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator from Indiana insist on pushing the bill?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think it is right. I have no interest in pushing it; I do not know any of the parties; but it struck the committee as being a fair case. A soldier is in the service of the country until he is properly discharged. A sick leave or a furlough never discharges the soldier from the service. This man came to his death accidentally by drowning. He was a sick soldier and may have fallen into the water accidentally. We cannot tell how that was. At all events he was a soldier in the service of his country, and we think his widow entitled to a pension. His sickness was in the line of his duty; he had been in the hospital several days. The manner of his drowning can never be proved any more than it is now.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senate will not pass the bill.

The bill was passed.

SARAH E. WILSON.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move now to take up the bill (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for placing the name of Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson, widow of William H. Wilson, late acting surgeon United States volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of seventeen dollars per month, to commence from the passage of the bill and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. KIRKWOOD on the 6th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the application of Sarah E. Wilson, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to submit the following report:

William H. Wilson, the husband of the applicant, was sergeant of company I, eighty-second regiment New York volunteers; that he was a practicing physician and surgeon of good standing in his profession; that at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, he was detailed to act in his professional capacity on the field; that while so acting he was taken prisoner by the enemy; that he remained in the hands of the enemy as a prisoner until the fall of that year, when he was paroled and returned to his home; that at the battle of Antietam, being still unexchanged, he reported to the proper authorities at Washington in his professional capacity, and was sent to the battlefield to assist in caring for the wounded; that he discharged that duty faithfully and well, and while in the discharge thereof contracted the disease whereof he died March 22, 1863.

The committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. H. TINKER AND J. P. McELROY.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move next to take up the bill (S. No. 76) to grant pensions to Walter H. Tinker and John P. McElroy, of Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Committee on Pensions made an adverse report in the case, because it is covered by the provisions of the general law. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

NICHOLAS HIBNER.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of Nicholas Hibner, late a private in the sixth regiment Missouri State militia.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Nicholas Hibner, of Caldwell county, Missouri, and late a private in the sixth regiment (cavalry) Missouri State militia, commanded by Colonel Catherwood, upon the list of pensioners at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the passage of this act, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH E. PICKELL.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to take up House bill No. 458, granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That bill was reported adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORRILL. On that motion I desire to read a communication upon which I may base a motion. I have had addressed to me a communication from certain persons who sign themselves an executive committee of the colored Union League in this city. I have been very much troubled to know what to do with it, but the Senator's motion offers me an opportunity to read it to the Senate, and then I propose to base a motion upon it. It is:

Whereas the 16th of April will be the anniversary of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and whereas colored citizens of the District are desirous of commemorating the great triumph of free and Christian principles over the wicked power of slavery and treason: Therefore,

Resolved, That we celebrate the said day with appropriate ceremonies.

Resolved, That looking to Congress as the sincere defenders of free and Christian principles, and as our true friends and protector in the trials and dangers with which we are surrounded, we respectfully ask that body to participate in the celebration of the anniversary of our emancipation.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to both branches of Congress.

We leave it to your honorable body to decide in what way and manner the said day shall be celebrated.

Very respectfully, J. L. HICKMAN,

Executive Committee of the Colored Union League.

The 16th of April coming on Monday, I propose to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa, so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. I submit that amendment in order to test the sense of the Senate on the communication which I have felt it my duty to read to the Senate. I simply bring the communication to the consideration of the Senate in this way with a view to taking the sense of the Senate on the subject. I do not wish to press it unnecessarily.

Several SENATORS. Do not press that.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment being withdrawn the question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. MORRILL. I now present to the Senate the communication which I have just read, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate, and the indulgence of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to elicit an answer to the following question: when is it his intention to press upon the attention of the Senate the bill conferring the right to vote upon the colored men in the District of Columbia? I believe, sir, that in this question there is a solution of the problem of reconstruction, if favorably considered by the Senate. I am in favor of voting, with no restrictions or reservations except the qualification of honest manhood. Educational qualifications may draw to the support of the question the weak and the timid. I am not, I hope, of that class.

While I am absorbed with the conviction that the bonded-warehouse system is detrimental to the interests of the country, and while I know that the delay in relieving the industry of the country from the burden of taxation now embarrasses every trade and our many agricultural and manufacturing interests, I yet am profoundly convinced that this subject is paramount in importance to all others. I therefore hope that the Senator from Maine will without delay ask the attention of the Senate to the House bill granting suffrage to the colored men of the District of Columbia. I shall be glad if he can at this time designate a day when he will move the Senate to the consideration of this important national question, and that he and the Senate will support the House bill granting the right of suffrage to the colored citizens of the District without reservation or restriction of any kind.

When that question is brought before the Senate I shall take an opportunity to show that upon the granting of the privilege of voting to the colored citizens in the southern States depends the maintenance of the Union, the power of the country, and the permanence of a republican form of government.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be remembered, perhaps, that the Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill to which allusion is made some weeks ago, and at that time an attempt was made to bring the measure before the Senate, but there were several other measures considered of such importance as to justify, in the judgment of the Senate, their consideration at that time, which necessarily excluded the consideration of this bill. It has been my purpose from that time to the present to embrace the first opportunity to present the subject anew to the Senate, and I will say to my honorable friend from Rhode Island that at an early day I shall endeavor to call up the measure and press it on the consideration of the Senate.

VIRGINIA K. V. MOORE.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move now to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Virginia K. V. Moore, daughter of Richard D. Moore, deceased, late of company K, seventy-second regiment Illinois volunteers, on the list of invalid pensioners, and pay to her, or her legally appointed guardian, the sum of eight dollars per month from December 3, 1863, the date of the death of Richard D. Moore, until she shall have attained the age of sixteen years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what the precedent is for that.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, by which it appeared that Richard D. Moore entered the service of the United States in 1862, and that he was discharged on the 18th of August, 1863, on the certificate of an Army surgeon, for disability. The certificate sets forth that Moore had disease of the lungs, and that, in the surgeon's opinion, he had that disease at the time he entered the service. Private Moore died at the Sisters of Mercy hospital in Chicago, December 3, 1863, leaving no wife, but one minor child. Virginia K. V. Moore, aged about seven years and five months. By the certificate of Lieutenant Allison, commanding the company of the deceased, it is shown that at the time of entering the service he was in good health, but on or about the 30th of July, 1862, he was taken sick, while in the line of his duty, with chronic diarrhoea, and placed in hospital, and he was discharged in 1863 on account of that sickness for which he went to the hospital in Chicago. By the affidavit of the attending physician of that hospital, it appears that he died of chronic diarrhoea contracted while in the service of the United States, and that he had no other disease at the time of his death. The committee being of the opinion that he died from sickness contracted while in the line of his duty, recommend the passage of the bill granting a pension to his daughter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any precedent for such an allowance?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I will explain the case in a moment. It comes to Congress on account of what is undoubtedly a false or mistaken report made by a medical officer of the Army. My own impression, after a very attentive examination of all the evidence in the case, is that it was a mistake on the part of that surgeon, who is since dead, calling this man's disease consumption, or phthisis pulmonaris, as he expressed it, and he said the man was so disabled when he came into the Army. There is a mass of evidence to the contrary. His commanding officer certifies that he was a well man; his neighbors certify that he was a well man. There is a letter written by him while on the march to Vicksburg, which succeeded in the taking of that place, enumerating the hardships which the Army encountered in getting there; and there were some most cruel hardships to which they were subjected. In that letter he says that when he joined the Army his weight was one hundred and sixty-eight pounds, which is a heavy weight, I should suppose, for a man afflicted with consumption, and that it had by that time been reduced to one hundred and forty-seven pounds. He acquitted himself most nobly at the siege of Vicksburg, as the testimony of his commanding officer shows; but at that time he was attacked with a disease that is mentioned in the papers. He continued there for some time, still suffering from that disease, and was then removed to the Mercy hospital, at Chicago, where he remained until he died. There are among the papers letters from himself, written from that point, in which, although he does not speak directly of his disease, he describes it, so that evidently it was not consumption, but the disease mentioned in the report. The surgeon attending the patients in the hospital of the Sisters of Mercy makes a very distinct affidavit that the man suffered while there, and died, finally, of that disease—chronic diarrhoea.

It seems, from all this testimony, that the Army surgeon, as I have already stated, must have been mistaken. Perhaps it resulted from some confusion about the man. It is that point alone which prevented the Commissioner of Pensions from granting the pension in this case; and I believe there is in the papers a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions recommending the case to the consideration of Congress. They are very strict and very technical at the Pension Office, and we have had before our committee numerous cases where pensions have been refused merely upon a technicality. This is one such, or you may call it a case of conflict of evidence, if you please; but I think that in the absence of a certificate from the surgeon of the corps to which he belonged the testimony of his commanding officer ought to be taken. He has not only that, but he has the confirmation of the other surgeon of whom I have spoken, and the testimony of his neighbors and friends; and lastly, there is a letter from a gentleman who conversed with the Sisters of Mercy, in charge of the hospital, who told him that that was the disease with which he was afflicted and of which he died.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My question did not go to the matter of the disease. I asked whether there were precedents for granting pensions to children.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Under the pension law, pensions are continued to minor children under sixteen years of age.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that the general law?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Where there is no widow.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There is no widow here; the proof shows that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are they granted to the children of all who are killed or die of disease contracted in the service?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; where there is no widow, to minor children up to sixteen years of age. Then the pension stops.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The pension is divided among them. This man was a remarkably intelligent man; his letters show it; he was for a time a war correspondent of the New York Herald. His wife died before the war, and he seems from the time of her death to have been leading a wandering life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEWIS W. DIETRICH.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move now to take up the bill (H. R. No. 444) granting pension to Lewis W. Dietrich.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Lewis W. Dietrich, late a second lieutenant of company E, thirtieth regiment United States colored troops, on the pension-list, and to pay him a pension at the rate of fifteen dollars per month.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Let the report in this case be read; I have forgotten the circumstances.

The Secretary read the report made by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, by which it appeared that Lieutenant Dietrich, while on duty in the field in front of Petersburg, and while in the act of cleaning his pistol, on the 11th of October, 1864, was severely wounded in the hand by its accidental discharge, and that subsequently, from the nature of the wound, it became necessary to submit to an amputation of his hand, and by reason of disability he was honorably discharged the service. The committee, believing that the wound of Lieutenant Dietrich was an incident of the service in which he was engaged, regarded him as entitled to a pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH YORK.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (H. R. No. 443) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth York, widow of Shubal York, late surgeon in the fifty-fourth regiment Illinois infantry volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides for placing the name of Elizabeth York, widow of Shubal York, late a surgeon in the fifty-fourth regiment Illinois volunteer infantry, on the pension-rolls, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, from which it appeared that during Surgeon York's service, on the 28th of March, 1864, he was shot and killed at Charlestown, Coles county, Illinois, by disloyal citizens of that vicinity, he being at the time on a journey from his home to rejoin his regiment, he being in no respect in fault, but his death being caused by a wanton and unprovoked attack upon him and other soldiers by rebel citizens in that locality.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BETSEY NASH.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (H. R. No. 445) for the relief of the legal representatives of Betsey Nash, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to extend the provisions of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1857, for the relief of Betsey Nash, to her legal representatives, and the amount appropriated by that act is directed to be paid to them; but the sum paid by virtue of this act is not to exceed the amount due Betsey Nash at the time of her death.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that there have been adverse reports in this case.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The bill comes from the House of Representatives; I do not know that it has ever been in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that it has been reported on adversely heretofore.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not see any reason why the pension should be extended to the legal representatives.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If there is any objection to the bill I am willing to let it lie over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better lie over.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The committee thought that the report made in the House of Representatives was satisfactory.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. It does not appear that there has been any adverse report.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the bill be postponed for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS HURLY.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 25) for the relief of Thomas Hurly.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place the name of Thomas Hurly, late a private of company K, eighth Tennessee cavalry, upon the pension-rolls, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, by which it appeared that Thomas Hurly while in the line of his duty was taken prisoner by the enemy at Bull's Gap, East Tennessee, was paroled and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, from which place a furlough of thirty days was granted him to visit his home at Binghamton, New York. He was very weak and feeble from starvation and confinement at Danville prison. While on the Cleveland and Erie railroad being unable to obtain a seat he felt faint and went upon the platform of the car to get some fresh air, when feeling still faint and attempting to sit down he fell from the platform and was run over by the cars, in consequence of which accident his legs were amputated, March 7, 1865, and he was mustered out of service July 17, 1865. The committee deem his case an eminently just one, and report a bill for his relief.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall not make any opposition to the bill; I do not wish to do so; but I have always understood that the rule was imperative not to grant pensions to soldiers or officers who met with an accident while away on a visit. I know of a case in my own State where an officer, and a very meritorious one, had leave of absence to go to New Orleans, and on the way he was drowned; the vessel was blown up or burst her boilers or something of that kind; and a pension was denied. I suppose that must be the general rule, and for that reason this special bill is introduced.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this is to be passed, I suppose there will be a great many other cases of a similar description. I know that was a very severe case because the man left a family.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. We have a bill which the Senator from West Virginia will call up in a few minutes to apply to all cases of a furlough, so that we shall have no more special legislation on this subject, but a general law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not let this case and all others of this description come under that general law?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This bill has already passed the House of Representatives and will go into operation sooner.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN SHEEHY.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 461) granting a pension to Ann Sheehy.

By the bill the Secretary of the Interior is directed to place the name of Ann Sheehy, of Boston, Massachusetts, on the roll of invalid pensions, and pay or cause to be paid to her the sum of eight dollars per month during her widowhood; and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are directed to settle and adjust the accounts of John Sheehy, late a private in company D, twenty-eighth Massachusetts volunteers, and pay to Ann Sheehy the amount that may be found to have been due him on the 3d day of July, 1863, the date of his death.

The Secretary read the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, from which it appears that Ann Sheehy is the step-mother of John Sheehy, late a private of company D, twenty-eighth Massachusetts volunteers. Ann married the father of John in 1850, at which time John was but six years of age, when she took charge of him and discharged all the duties to him of a mother. In 1857 the father of John died, leaving him entirely dependent on his step-mother for support. On the 22d of November, 1861, he enlisted in the twenty-eighth Massachusetts volunteers, and about this time the step-mother and all the family became dependent on the son. On July 3, 1863, he was killed while in the line of duty at the battle of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, leaving no relative in this country. The committee believe that the duties performed by Ann Sheehy of a mother come within the reason of the law granting pensions to mothers dependent upon sons killed in service, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask if the committee design to extend all these cases to the step-mother. Has that been usual?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It has never been done before; it is a departure from the rule; but the circumstances appeared so peculiar that we thought it an appropriate case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are a great many other peculiar circumstances.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. She took this boy when he was six years old and raised and supported him until he got large enough to go into the Army. He went into the Army and was killed. Before his entering the Army her health failed entirely, and he supported her up to the time he entered the service. He was killed in the service; and although she is a step-mother I do not see why the law should not be made to apply to her. She performed all the duties of a mother for some fifteen years in raising him. The papers show him to have been a good young man; he supported her when her health failed until he was killed, and the simple question is, whether we shall put a step-mother on the same footing that his real mother would have been put. His real mother would have been embraced, but the step-mother is not, in the present law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to reject one of these cases, but this is extending the principle very far, and the argument would apply just as strongly in case this woman had been an aunt or even a person not connected by blood or marriage. We have never extended pensions so far as this and I am disinclined to enter on this principle.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the bill had better be passed over and settled in a full Senate. We can settle it better then than now, at any rate.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the bill be laid aside for the present. It does introduce a new principle, no doubt.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. ANNA G. GASTON.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the bill (S. No. 261) for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston, of the city of Washington, widow of Albert G. Gaston, deceased, late a lieutenant in the sixteenth regiment of Virginia volunteers, from the date of the discharge of her husband from the military service of the United States on account of disability arising from disease contracted in the service until the date of his death, namely, from the 5th of May, 1863, to the 7th of February, 1865, and to cause to be paid to her a pension at the rate of seventeen dollars per month for that term, without prejudice to the pension heretofore allowed her by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, on the 11th of April:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, widow of Albert G. Gaston, late a lieutenant in the sixteenth regiment of Virginia volunteers, respectfully report:

That the petitioner has been placed upon the pension-roll, and has drawn and is still drawing a pension of seventeen dollars per month since the 17th day of February, in the year 1865, but that her husband was honorably discharged on the 5th day of May, 1863, for disability arising from severe disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty, and the petitioner prays that she may be allowed a pension at the above rate from the time of her husband's discharge until his death. The tenth section of the supplementary pension act of 1864 provides, in substance, that if any person entitled to an invalid pension under the act of 1862 shall die while his application for such pension is pending, leaving a widow entitled to receive a pension by reason of his service and death, the pension to such widow shall commence from the date at which the decedent's invalid pension would have commenced had he survived.

It appears from the testimony filed with the petition that the decedent, from the time of his discharge until his death, remained at his home in this city in a low and almost helpless state, but that he nevertheless initiated measures to obtain his pension by the employment of an agent to prepare the necessary papers and bring them to him for his signature, and as he was growing worse from day to day, manifested great solicitude and anxiety on the subject. The papers were not prepared by the agent, and consequently no application for his pension was made by the decedent.

The committee, believing that this case is clearly within the spirit, if not the letter, of the said tenth section of the act of 1864, inasmuch as the decedent's preparations to make his application were in progress at the time of his death, and he unable, from the rapid progress of his disease, to give the matter his personal superintendence, or otherwise hasten it, respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator from Indiana had better consent to lay that bill aside. It also establishes a new rule entirely.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. During my connection with the Pension Committee there have certainly been all the time cases where a party has been deprived of a pension simply by some technicality, or because as in this case for some reason he was not just in time. This man was in the service and contracted a disease from lying on the ground and exposure, and lay an invalid on his bed. During the interval that elapsed from his being honorably discharged from the service as disabled and the time of his death, he was very sick indeed, scarcely able to help himself. During that time, however, he endeavored to have an application made to the Pension Office. He employed an agent to prepare his papers, but that agent it seems moved away, or for some reason could not be found. He was greatly solicitous about it, and sent his wife and others to find the agent. They could not learn where he went except that he had gone to the State of Connecticut; they did not know to what particular place. The party was doing all he could to have his application entered at the Pension Office, and perhaps if he had lived three days longer the application might have been filed there, and then the widow would have been entitled to the pension for the whole time. The case is very clear. The Commissioner of Pensions has allowed the widow a pension dating from his death, and the law as quoted in the report is express that where the application is pending at the time of the death the pension relates back to the time of the disability. If, as we consider, this is a debt which we owe to these soldiers, we ought not to take advantage of what could not have been their negligence under the circumstances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much time does it cover?

Mr. GRIMES. I understand the Senator to lay down the rule that this is justice to all. Then why not change your law and make it so? Why say that this particular woman shall be entitled to a pension for these two years that elapsed before the application was actually perfected, when you do not make the same allowance to soldiers who happen to be remote from this place, and who have greater disadvantages in securing pensions than these people?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The Senator does not understand the case. This widow applied for a pension and received it from the date of her husband's death. If he had made the application during his lifetime, the law would have made her pension commence from the date of his disability. If the agent had done his duty he might have filed the papers in ten days. They are perfectly clear, so that the pension was at once granted by the Commissioner upon them. The proof of marriage and everything else is complete.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt there are ten thousand cases, and more too, in the United States, where there is more or less time, one year or two or three years, between the period when the person who rendered the service dies and the time when the widow or surviving heirs make their application. As I understand it, we settle, in this instance, if we pass this bill, a rule by which we are to be governed in the future, that in such cases as that we shall pay pension between the time at which the parties might have applied and the time at which they did actually apply and secure the pension.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. There is a law that in certain cases an application must be made within three years, or otherwise the pension commences only from the time the proof is completed. That is intended, of course, as a safeguard to induce people to come forward at the proper time. But here the party endeavored to make his application. He was a poor sick man, lying on his bed, utterly helpless. He brought his case so near completion that a day or two might have completed it, or it might have been done if this agent had returned to the city before his death. If, as I said before, we consider that this is at all a debt which we owe to these men—and I consider it so to whatever extent the law gives it to them—I do not think we ought to take advantage of a little lapse of time in this way, when the party himself was not and could not have been in fault. If it had been a case of voluntary delay; if he had made no effort to have his application presented, then I should have nothing to say in favor of the claim.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not speaking now in regard to this case particularly; but if we are to be governed by those humane motives to which the Senator from West Virginia alludes, I want to have the principle apply to other cases as well as this particular one, and I want the Senator, as a member of the Committee on Pensions, to allow other soldiers or the widows of other soldiers to recover their pensions between the time that they may claim that they attempted to secure their pensions and the time they actually did secure them. We give to this woman three or four hundred dollars, as I understand it, by this bill; that is a mere bagatelle; but we settle a principle that we must be governed by in the future, contrary to the precedent that has hitherto existed and by which we have been governed before. I do not understand that the Senator from West Virginia controverts that fact; but simply upon the ground that this deceased soldier made an attempt to secure his pension but was unsuccessful, we are to make the allowance. Is the Senator prepared to say that whenever a case shall be presented here where the widow claims that her deceased husband has attempted to secure a pension and has failed in being able to do it, she shall be allowed, as in this instance? Here is a man from my State; he applies; he has not got the requisite testimony; he has just as meritorious a case as this; a man who has suffered and bled in the service; he employs an agent; the agent is not competent to transact the business; he sends on his papers, and the papers are found to be defective; whose fault is it? Does not that present just as much merit as this case? While they are making that effort to secure a pension, but are refused, the man dies. If we settle this rule for this case in the way that it is proposed by the Committee on Pensions to settle it, would not that person from my State be entitled to a pension between the time that the man made the abortive attempt to secure the pension and the time his widow actually did secure it? Certainly, according to the principle contended for here.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The cases are not similar. In this case a particular application is made for which the proofs must be perfected or no pension will be allowed. The widow subsequently makes application, the proofs are perfected, and the pension allowed, showing that this man most certainly would have got his pension if his application had been made and he had survived until it was disposed of at the Pension Office. The Senator is also mistaken in supposing that I put this upon humane grounds. There are such cases that come before us occasionally, and I am happy to know that they have been responded to when they come distinctly on that ground. But I mentioned the sickness of the man as showing his inability to do more than he did do; that while he was taking steps to have his application made, and was prevented giving it his personal supervision, he died, and simply because he died a few days sooner his widow is to lose the compensation that the law intended for her, as I think. If every case was to be decided, when it comes here, strictly according to law, there would be nothing that I know of for the Pension Committee to do. All, or pretty much all, the cases that come before us are exceptional cases, and we have to examine the testimony, and generally speaking, where we believe there has been no laches, no neglect, no misconduct, nothing wrong on the part of the applicant, but there is only a technical difficulty or something of this kind, where the time has expired a little too soon, the committee have been in the habit of reporting and both Houses of passing such bills. I think this addresses itself not to the humanity, but to the sense of justice of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that the Senate has been in the habit of passing such bills. I served for some year on the Committee on Pensions, and

I never knew any such bill as this to pass, and I think I could with safety appeal to the President of the body, who was chairman of that committee, to say that no such bill ever did pass founded on such a principle.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I mean to say that they propose bills where the party does not bring himself quite within the law, so that the Commissioner can grant a pension.

Mr. GRIMES. Of course I agree with the Senator from West Virginia that if we adhered strictly to the law there would be no necessity for the Committee on Pensions; but then there are certain rules by which that committee has been governed, and one of those rules is that pensions shall not be allowed between the time when the party makes application for a pension and the time when it shall be granted.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This bill is founded on a law precisely contrary to what the Senator now states. The law provides that if the application is made at a certain time, the pension shall relate back to the time of the disability. This bill is to give the benefit of that provision to this widow.

Mr. GRIMES. I am quite well satisfied that this bill establishes too important a principle for us to pass it now in so thin a Senate, a principle that, as I understand it, will involve the taking of millions of dollars out of the Treasury. I desire that the bill be laid over until we can examine it more fully.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. You will bear me witness, Mr. President, that the rule of the Pension Committee, and in both Houses of Congress, has been variable. Sometimes the pension under special law is made to revert back to the time of disability, and sometimes only to the passage of the act. We have, during this session, in our committees, resolved to make the pensions always commence from the passage of the act, and not go back. But under the present law, where a pension is applied for in the Pension Office, and it is granted, it relates back to the filing of the application. This is a very peculiar case. The man was sick, unable to attend to his business, utterly prostrate, dying; and in that condition he sent his wife to employ an agent to file his claim for a pension. He had his neighbors running to try to get up his papers, he lying prostrate, sick all the time, worrying about his papers; and before he could get the papers presented by the agent, he died.

The Commissioner of Pensions, in a letter to the committee, recommends this as an especially meritorious case, coming within the spirit but not the letter of the law. He was unable to make his application from disease and sickness. The case the gentleman from Iowa puts might be a little different; the neglect might have been voluntary; there might have been no good reason for it; but I am free to say that when the delay is explained satisfactorily to my mind, as the delay in this case, I shall, without the slightest hesitation, vote for the pension.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator had better let this go over if he has other bills, because the Senate is very thin now.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that this bill be laid aside for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITALS AND REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit the following report from a committee of conference, and ask that it may be acted upon now:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue cutters having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first, second, and third amendments.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment to the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided," in line twelve of said bill, down to the word "where," in line seventeen, and insert the following:

"That the hospitals at Cleveland, Ohio, and Portland, Maine, shall not be sold or leased, nor shall any hospital be sold or leased."

Z. CHANDLER,
JOHN SHERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. B. WASHBURN,
B. EGGLESTON,
J. M. HUMPHREY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

OBITUARY ADDRESSES ON SENATOR FOOT.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be published, in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, six thousand copies of the addresses made by members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives upon the occasion of the announcement of the death of Hon. Solomon Foot, and that Rev. Dr. Sunderland be requested to furnish a copy of the sermon delivered by him at the funeral of Senator Foot, to be published with said addresses.

CATTLE PLAGUE.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate whether he has any information that the rinderpest or cattle plague, which has been so destructive on the eastern continent, has appeared in any part of the United States, and whether in his judgment any further measures can be adopted to prevent the introduction or spread of such disease in this country, and if he has information what remedies and what course of treatment are advisable.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that should be addressed to the chief of the Bureau of Agriculture.

Mr. POLAND. I understand that the Bureau of Agriculture is a part of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; it is a perfectly independent Department.

Mr. POLAND. The resolution in the first place was directed to that Department; but I supposed it was more appropriate to have it directed to the Department of the Interior. I will modify the resolution so as to direct it to the Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified, if there be no objection.

Mr. POLAND. I understand that some information on this subject is in the possession of the Department which ought to go before the country.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Martha McCook, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. VAN WINKLE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions.

The first section of this bill proposed to repeal section five of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, and section three of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865, and to substitute the following in lieu thereof:

That from and after the passage of this act all persons now by law entitled to a less pension than hereinafter specified, who shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or who shall have lost both hands, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, in the military or naval service and in the line of duty, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-five dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost both feet, or one hand and one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, shall be entitled to a pension of fifteen dollars per month.

The second section of the bill declares that any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer of any right, claim, or interest in any pension which has been, or may hereafter be granted, shall be void and of no effect; and any person acting as attorney to receive and receipt for money for and in behalf of any person entitled to a pension shall, before receiving the money, take and subscribe an oath, to be filed with the pension agent, and by him to be transmitted, with the vouchers now required by law, to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, that he has no interest in the money by any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer, and that he does not know or believe that the same has been so disposed of to any person; and any person who shall falsely take this oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction, shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury.

The third section provides that any person who shall present or cause to be presented at any pension agency any power of attorney or other paper required as a voucher in drawing a pension, which paper shall bear a date subsequently to that on which it was actually signed or executed, shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both, at the discretion of the court before whom the conviction shall be had.

The fourth section repeals section one of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865.

The fifth section provides that if any person entitled to an invalid pension has died since March 4, 1861, or shall hereafter die while an application for such pension is pending, and after the proof has been completed, leaving no widow and no minor child under sixteen years of age, his heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to which the applicant would have been entitled had the certificate been issued before his death.

The sixth section provides that in all cases when a commission shall have been regularly issued to any person in the military or naval service who shall have died or been disabled while in the line of duty, after the date of the commission, and before being mustered, such officer or other person entitled to a pension for such death or disability by existing laws shall receive a pension corresponding to his rank, as determined by such commission, the same as if he had been mustered; but this section is not to apply to any officer who shall have willfully neglected or refused to be so mustered.

According to the seventh section, officers absent on sick leave, and enlisted men absent on sick furlough, are to be regarded in the administration of the pension laws in the same manner as if they were in the field or hospital.

The eighth section provides that the period of service of all persons entitled to the benefits of the pension laws, or on account of whose death any person may become entitled to a pension, shall be construed to extend to the time of disbanding the organization to which such persons belonged, or until their actual discharge for other cause than the expiration of the service of such organization.

The ninth section declares that enlisted men employed as teamsters, wagoners, artificers, hospital stewards, farriers, saddlers, and all other enlisted men, however employed in the service of the Army or Navy, not specifically mentioned in the first section of an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, shall be regarded, in the administration of the pension laws, as non-commissioned officers or privates.

The tenth section provides that if any officer, soldier, or seaman shall have died of wounds received or of disease contracted in the line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States, leaving a widow and a child or child under the age of sixteen years, and it shall be duly certified under seal, by any court having probate jurisdiction, that satisfactory evidence has been produced before such court that the widow has abandoned the care of such child or children, or is an unsuitable person by reason of immoral conduct to have the custody of the same, then no pension shall be allowed to such widow until the minor child or children shall have become sixteen years of age, any previous enactment to the contrary notwithstanding; and the minor child or children shall be pensioned in the same manner as if no widow had survived the officer, soldier, or seaman, and such pension may be paid to the regularly authorized guardian of such minor or minors.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line twelve, after the word "persons," to strike out the word "now;" and in line twelve, after the word "who," to insert "while in the military or naval service and in the line of duty."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The word "now" is proposed to be stricken out as superfluous; at any rate, if laws are hereafter passed including another class of persons in the pension laws, we should have to reenact all these provisions with reference to them. The amendment in line twelve, to insert the words "while in the military or naval service, and in the line of duty," is a mere transposition of words, which depends upon the next amendment in the fifteenth and sixteenth lines, striking out the same words. It may be passed by, therefore, until the next amendment is considered.

I will state to the Senate that the sections of acts proposed to be repealed are those which grant to a man who has lost both feet a pension of twenty dollars a month; where he has lost both hands or both eyes, twenty-five dollars a month; and where he has lost one hand and one foot, twenty dollars a month. The provisions in relation to those disabilities are incorporated in this bill in perhaps a better form. The committee of the Senate has gone further, and placed in the same classes other disabilities which are equal to the disabilities named. I ask the Secretary to read the next amendment with reference to the words that are transposed.

The Secretary read the amendment, in section one, line fifteen, to strike out the words "in the military or naval service, and in the line of duty," and to insert "or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the constant personal aid and attendance of another."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Various petitions have been presented to Congress asking that particular provision might be made for those who lost one hand or one arm. This brought the subject to the consideration of the committee, and they came to the conclusion that there were disabilities which were equal to even the severest of those now mentioned in the present law as it now stands, which ought to be included. For instance, a case was related to us by a member of the committee who sits on the opposite side of the Chamber of a soldier now in hospital at Louisville. He was shot through the throat, or somewhere in that region, and is unable to swallow anything but liquids, and is also unable to feed himself. We thought that was a case, as presented to us, certainly equal to the loss of both hands or both legs.

The provisions of this section, including the amendments of the Senate committee, are offered in lieu of propositions that have been made to increase the rate of pensions generally. The committees of both Houses, and I believe with the approbation of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior, have thought that this was the best way to do justice to all. I ask the attention of the Senate to this subject. They will perceive that we come to a second class of disabilities who receive a lower rate of pension, and that there are included in that class those whose disability goes to a certain extent; and so of a third class. By our rules I presume we are required to take up each amendment as it stands. I propose, therefore, to take the vote on the amendment just read, which, as the Senate will perceive, transposes the words which otherwise need not be inserted.

I will say further that the committee had a correspondence with the Pension Bureau on this subject, and a classification and gradation of pensions was made out, and I had the honor to report a bill prepared at the Pension Bureau for that purpose to the Senate; but after the House bill came to us we supposed that we could incorporate the valuable provisions of the Senate bill in this bill, and adopt their bill generally as it stands. I think the Senate can have no doubt that there are disabilities as gross as those of the loss of both hands, or both legs, or both eyes. There are numerous such cases. There are those who are suffering from disease by which they are perfectly and entirely helpless, so that, as one of the amendments states, they need the constant personal aid and attendance of another person. Those we put with the highest class. Those who are incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much so as to require constant personal aid and attention, are placed in the second class, and those otherwise so disabled as to materially interfere with the performance of manual labor without wholly incapacitating them therefor are made a third class, including those who lost one hand, and so on, while the fourth class is composed of those who receive the regular pension of privates, eight dollars per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The amendment just agreed to is on transposing those words, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment that was read, striking out the word "now" is the one on which the Senate has just voted. The next amendment in order will be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was in section one, line twelve, after the word "who" to insert "while in the military or naval service and in the line of duty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line fifteen after the word "same" to strike out the words "in the military or naval service; and in the line of duty," and to insert:

Or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the constant personal aid and attendance of another person.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-three, after the word "same," to insert the words:

Or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much so as to require constant personal aid and attention.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-eight, after the word "same," to insert the words "or otherwise so disabled as to materially interfere with the performance of manual labor, without wholly incapacitating them therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The first section of the bill as amended reads as follows:

That section five of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, and section three of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and the following shall stand in lieu thereof. That from and after the passage of this act all persons by law entitled to a less pension than hereinafter specified, who, while in the military or naval service and in the line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or who shall have lost both hands, or been permanently and totally disabled in the same, [in the military or naval service and in the line of duty,] or otherwise so permanently and totally disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the constant personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-five dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost both feet, or one hand and one foot, or been totally and permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, but not so much so as to require constant personal aid and attention, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally or permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to materially interfere with the performance of manual labor, without wholly incapacitating them therefor, shall be entitled to a pension of fifteen dollars per month.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this or any other act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify the sixth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act to grant pensions approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, or to entitle a person to receive more than one pension at the same time.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. In reference to that amendment, I send to the Secretary a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which he will please read down to the pencil marks on the third page.

The Secretary read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1866.

SIR: I notice that the bill supplemental to the existing laws in relation to pensions has passed the House of Representatives and been reported to the Senate.

I have the honor to invite your attention to the accompanying draft of two additional sections. A few words will suffice to explain their nature and object.

The fourth section of the act of 1865 was drawn up in this Department and was designed to define more clearly the rights of the children of a soldier, sailor, or officer who dies leaving a widow. Serious doubts were entertained whether under the preëxisting law the children were entitled to a pension if he left a widow, although she died or remarried before the children attained the age of sixteen years. The words "if there be no widow" were construed to refer to the period of the soldier's death. The section was therefore incorporated in the bill and is a substantial reenactment of a corresponding provision of the act of 1862, making only such changes as were required to determine with more precision and clearness the rights of the children where there was a widow, or in the event of her subsequent marriage or death. It was not intended to affect the sixth section of the act of 1864, which is justly regarded by the Pension Bureau as a salutary provision. It may, however, have such effect, and the first section of the draft was prepared to obviate that construction.

It also declares that no person shall receive more than one pension at the same time; the act of 1862 contains such a provision, but it is sometimes contended that it relates only to pensions authorized by that act. The words in the draft are sufficiently broad and comprehensive to relieve the question from all doubt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert as an additional section the following:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That so much of the fourth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, as authorizes and empowers the Commissioner of Pensions to detail clerks in his office be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter detail clerks in the Department, or in one of the bureaus thereof, for the purposes in said section mentioned, or to secure the more effectual execution of the pension laws and the rights of pensioners; but clerks so detailed shall not for any special service be entitled to additional compensation beyond the customary per diem and mileage.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask the Secretary to read the balance of the letter that I sent to the desk.

The Secretary read, as follows:

You will perceive that the remaining section repeals a part of the fourth section of the act of July 4, 1864, and substitutes another provision. It is not proposed to repeal the whole section, as that would revive the twelfth section of the act of 1863, which was found in practice to be objectionable. The provision which is substituted confers upon the Secretary of the Interior, who, as you are aware, has the supervisory control over the Pension Bureau, the power to detail clerks, which that section confers, for certain specific purposes, upon the Commissioner of Pensions. This power should, in my opinion, be exercised by the head of the Department; and I am not aware of another instance in our legislation where it has been withdrawn from him and vested in a bureau office. The power to detail clerks to examine and report in regard to any branch of the public service, under the charge of a Department, may justly be considered as incidental to the authority vested by law in the head of such Department, and I respectfully submit that such power should not be lodged elsewhere. The first clause of the second section of the draft repealing in part the fourth section of the act of 1864, might perhaps accomplish the purpose, but it may be proper that the power of the Secretary to detail a clerk for the purposes mentioned in the draft should be unequivocally recognized by Congress. The concluding portion of the draft excludes the claim of such clerk to any additional compensation for such special service, and allows him nothing beyond his traveling and other incidental expenses. In that respect it conforms to the existing usage of the Department.

I recommend the adoption of these two sections.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES HARLAN,
Secretary.

Hon. HENRY S. LANE, Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This amendment and the preceding one were brought to the notice of the committee after they had agreed to report this bill, and a majority of the committee assented to them and ordered them to be reported with the bill. I was one of those so assenting. As there was no discussion, or not much discussion of the matter in committee, I cannot repeat the views of the other members of the committee who are here to speak for themselves. But since I gave my assent to this amendment I have reflected somewhat on the subject, and, while I cannot say I have come to a different conclusion, I think there are some doubts as to the propriety of this change. Previous to the act of 1862 relating to pensions, these agents were clerks appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions. The act of 1862 provided for the appointment of special agents where frauds were suspected upon the pension laws to go and examine into them; and as the Secretary of the Interior states in his letter, and as I have been assured by the Commissioner of Pensions, it was found not to work well. These special agents having no familiarity with the business of the office, with the papers, or anything else connected with it, were not able to discharge the duties as efficiently as those who were better acquainted with the office, or to make as intelligent a report as the service of the office required. Accordingly, at the instance of the Pension Bureau, I believe a section was added in the law of 1864, placing the thing back where it had stood previously, without any law, and authorizing the Commissioner of Pensions to detail clerks in his Department to go and inspect the various pension offices if he should think there was occasion for it.

The Secretary of the Interior in his letter asks that this be changed, and that the appointment or designation of those clerks for this purpose may be given to him instead of the Commissioner of Pensions, and if I recollect rightly, he places it on the ground that being the head of the Department he ought to have that power and it ought not to be exercised by one of his subordinates. The doubt that has arisen in my mind arises from the peculiar construction of the Interior Department. In the Treasury, Post Office, and other Departments, all the actions of the various bureaus are converging to one point as it were; but in the Interior Department it seems to be different. The Pension Office, the Patent Office, the Land Office, and perhaps others, seem to be almost separate and independent offices. It appears to me that in those cases where the head of the bureau is charged with the administration, as it were, of the whole law in relation to a given subject, such as pensions, patents, or lands, where there is a peculiar responsibility devolving upon him, particularly in relation to the detection of frauds, he should have the power of appointment. Without saying that I have fully come to the conclusion that this change should not be made, that is the present tendency of my mind, and I should like to hear the views of those who are more experienced, or at any rate that the subject should receive the consideration of the Senate before the amendment is adopted.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am satisfied that the Secretary of the Interior should have the authority that this amendment provides for. I cannot conceive of a Department being properly carried on where there is independent action on the part of one bureau of the others and of the Secretary. It is perfectly easy for the Commissioner to consult the Secretary, and to hear any objections that he may have. Where this is done, where the heads of the bureaus act under the superintendence of the Secretary, all goes on right, and there is no trouble; but where they act independent of him, there is room for complaint. There must be one man at the head of every one of these Departments to wield control over it and all the bureaus in it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The nature of this amendment is just this: for the first fifty years under the administration of the Pension Bureau the Commissioner of Pensions had a right to appoint special agents to investigate frauds. Some two years ago that right was given to the Secretary of the Interior. Last year that was repealed and it was placed back again in the hands of the Commissioner of Pensions. Now, this is a proposition to place the power to appoint these agents in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. That is the amendment founded upon the letter of the Secretary of the Interior. I myself think these appointments should be made by the head of the bureau. He is more familiar with the character and qualifications of his own clerks than any one else can be. If frauds are perpetrated in the bureau, he, and no one else, is responsible for those frauds. Another reason is that the clerks in that bureau are familiar with the details of that office and more efficient than any one detailed from the whole of the Interior Department could possibly be. Without having any feeling about it, my impression is that the amendment should not be adopted. It was reported by the committee simply to get the sense of the Senate as to whether this power should be given to the Secretary of the Interior or remain with the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the amendment as it was reported from the committee is right. This idea of allowing heads of bureaus to send off agents, independent of the Secretary, may work very well when we have good heads of bureaus; but all these heads of bureaus have to report to the Secretary; he is the real head, and responsible for the transaction of the whole business of the department.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is it now?

Mr. POMEROY. As the law now stands, the heads of the different bureaus may send out their clerks without consulting the Secretary of the Interior. As the law is to be, if this amendment should be adopted, the Secretary of the Interior will send them out. Of course he is the man that ought to do it, as he is responsible for the whole Department, and ought to be allowed to send out such clerks as he may choose. I think the amendment is clearly right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Kansas whether there has been any abuse during the last year that requires a change of the law.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know that there has been any abuse; but this amendment, giving the Secretary of the Interior charge over this subject, makes the Interior Department in harmony with the other Departments of the Government. In the Treasury Department no particular bureau sends off a man to investigate a fraud, but the Secretary of the Treasury does it. He details clerks from the Department; and why the Secretary of the Interior should not have the same right that the other heads of Departments of the Government have I cannot understand. I recollect that two years ago we passed a law giving this power to the Secretary of the Interior. Subsequently, in some way or other, that law was repealed, and it was given to the Commissioner of Pensions. Now, the proposition is to restore it again to the Secretary of the Interior, and I think that is where it should be.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator if in the Treasury Department the heads of the National Currency Bureau and the Internal Revenue Bureau do not conduct their own affairs and make their own appointments.

Mr. POMEROY. I think not; only through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Are you sure of that?

Mr. POMEROY. That is the way I understand it. I know that is so with regard to the Internal Revenue Bureau, and I suppose it is true of the others.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My point is this: I cannot see any necessity for changing a law against which there is no complaint. I am perfectly willing to give this power to the Secretary of the Interior; but to take it away from the Commissioner, who has special charge of this business, would seem to be a reflection upon him, and I should be reluctant to change a little matter of this sort when there is no complaint of the law as it now stands.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Secretary of the Interior did not consider it a reflection on him when it was taken away from him by the law passed two years ago. I know of no reason why it should be so considered.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The Senator from Kansas is mistaken in saying that the power has been taken away from the Secretary of the Interior. Previous to the act of 1862 it was a mere usage which had grown up in the Department, and it is not proposed to change what was then done, except as to the mode of appointment. But in 1864, as I have already stated, a law was passed authorizing the appointment of special agents for this purpose; but, as stated by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, it was found not to operate well in practice, and then they returned to the old usage, but under the sanction of law. It is no reflection in that way. The Commissioner of Pensions is now by law authorized to appoint examining surgeons and other officers connected with the details of his office; and it appears to me, as has been already suggested, that this is a matter that is entirely within the proper duties of the Pension Office. It is not like sending Treasury agents to go South and investigate cotton sales and things of that kind, but it is the overseeing of the various pension agents throughout the country, and that devolves, it appears to me, especially upon the Commissioner of Pensions, he being in fact the responsible man for all that is done. In that view I am inclined to think that he should have the selection of these agents.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I have already said that in my judgment it is proper that this amendment should be adopted, and that the Secretary of the Interior should be recognized as the chief officer of that Department, without whose sanction nothing could be done. This idea of setting out independent bureaus here and giving them authority independent of the Secretary of the Interior will lead to no good, but must necessarily lead to harm. Ambitious individuals will draw to themselves the patronage which the chief of the Department ought to have. I can say for myself, that there never was a time, when I was in the Treasury, where I had a good officer that I did not consult him upon the propriety of all selections of this sort. At that time officers were appointed to examine the various ports of the country, to investigate frauds, to investigate the coinage, and everything of that kind, and while I was in the Department all this was done under my sanction, but not without consultation with the individual who had charge of that particular branch of the Department. It worked well, and it ought so to work. No man in any of our Departments should feel himself in any respect independent of the head of that Department. You cannot have one of the Departments governed well unless it is under the control of the man who is at the head of it. You hold him responsible, and he ought to be held responsible, and he ought to know everything that is done in the office, who is sent out and who is not sent out, and what the qualifications of the persons sent out are. It is proper that he should know it, and in order that everything may be done right, it is necessary that he should know it.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 18, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Cragin,

Fessenden, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morrill, Norton, Pomeroy, Ranney, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Wiley, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Backalew, Cowan, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Connors, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Wilson, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I offer, not on behalf of the committee, an amendment which I send to the Chair, to insert as an additional section the following:

*And be it further enacted, That the fourteenth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 14, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that the widows and children of colored soldiers and sailors who have been, or may be hereafter, killed, or who have died, or may hereafter die, of wounds received in battle, or of disease contracted in the military or naval service of the United States and in the line of duty, shall be entitled to receive the pensions provided by law without other evidence of marriage than proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of Pensions that the parties had habitually recognized each other as man and wife, and lived together as such for a definite period, not less than two years next preceding the enlistment of the man; and the children born of any marriage so proved shall be deemed and taken to be the children of the soldier or sailor and the party thereto: Provided, however, That if any such soldier or sailor and the woman alleged to be his widow, resided, previously to the enlistment of the former, in any State in which the marriage between them might have been legally solemnized, the usual evidence of marriage shall be required.*

My attention was called to this subject by a proposition introduced by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] the other day in reference to the bounties of colored soldiers. I had in fact shown him this amendment, which I believe met his approbation. The necessity for it arises from several considerations. Some change in the nature of things was required since the original provision on this subject was passed. Perhaps I can more shortly explain it to the Senate by stating wherein this amendment differs from the law that was passed in 1864; and, with the permission of the Senate, I will state a little history of that provision.

A bill came from the House of Representatives, I think, containing a provision in reference to these marriages. There was a third committee of conference on the bill, of which I was a member, and the Senator from Vermont who died recently [Mr. Foot] was the chairman or leading manager on the part of the Senate. There was a great difference of opinion among the managers when they came together. I went into an explanation of the nature of these marriages, and of the way these people lived together. The Senator from Vermont seized upon the idea and prepared the section upon which not only that committee unanimously agreed, although it included some of those who were supposed to be inimical to these soldiers, but it met the immediate approval of the Senate and the House. I remember it was about midnight when we went into committee.

I propose, as one change, to introduce into this act sailors as well as soldiers. I propose, also, to confine the time to the period of two years next preceding the enlistment of the man; and I do that upon this consideration: by the accidents of the war many of these people were driven from their homes, and probably driven into States where their marriages might have been legally solemnized; but, under the circumstances, it was hardly to be expected that their attention would be called to it. Again, I think it is very probable, although they have been taken in charge now by others, and have been free for some time, that those marriages have not been solemnized as rapidly, perhaps, as they should have been. This is therefore drawn to meet that case, that if they lived previous to the enlistment in any place where the marriage might have been solemnized, then this proof will not be sufficient.

I have also introduced a provision that the children born of any marriage so proved shall be deemed and taken to be the children of the soldier and the party thereto. That does not clearly appear in the section drawn up by the Senator from Vermont, and it may arise in cases where there is no widow or where the wife is dead; so that it would let in the same kind of proof of marriage in the case of the children applying for a pension to which they would be entitled under the law, as in the case of the widow.

It will be observed that the proviso declares:

That if any such soldier or sailor and the woman alleged to be his widow resided previously to the enlistment of the former in any State in which the marriage between them might have been legally solemnized the usual evidence of marriage shall be required.

I have there introduced the words "previously to the enlistment," which I explained a moment since.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask whether that is to be evidence that there is no other wife entitled to claim a pension.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The section of the law as it now stands provides that it is to be proved by the affidavits of credible witnesses, which would necessarily imply two witnesses. I have changed that in this amendment, so as to make it proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of Pensions. If the man and woman have lived together for two years next preceding the enlistment of the man, and recognized each other as man and wife, that is to be received as sufficient proof of marriage when that fact is established.

Mr. JOHNSON. But what I want to know, with the indulgence of my friend from West Virginia, is, whether that is to be considered as evidence that there is no other wife. It is only evidence that she was the last wife; but these people—because of the condition in which they have been placed in the past, not knowing there was any immorality in it, and being prohibited to some extent from marrying at all—were in the habit of having some four or five wives. As they were sold from master to master, or went from State to State, they contracted, according to their mode of contracting, a marriage. Many of these men I suppose really have wives, in the sense in which the term is used in this amendment, in half a dozen of the States. I wanted to know whether the amendment provides that it is to be the last only who is to receive the pension, so as to exclude antecedent ones.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Yes, sir. The Senator from Maryland is well aware, I presume, though many Senators may not be, that in the State of Virginia, for instance, there was no law prohibiting the marriage of slaves, but the common law would not recognize a contract made by a slave, either of marriage or anything else. They were, while slaves, in the habit of going through the forms of marriage. Some other negro would perhaps read from the printed ceremonies of one of the churches, and they acknowledged one another as man and wife, and, if virtuously inclined, lived together as man and wife, and conducted themselves seemly in that regard. They had, as the Senator from Maryland says, the idea that when they changed their location they could take another wife; and they have been doing it not very far from here, even since the war commenced. They are now getting the knowledge that the ceremony must be solemnized between them, or they will not be recognized; and that great evil of the system of slavery will, of course, cease. It would be hard, where a man and woman have lived together, considering themselves as man and wife, raising children and recognizing them as their children, that this woman, who was a wife in everything except the legal ceremony, and the children who, if that marriage could be recognized, were legitimate children, should be cut off from the benefit of the pension laws on account of this want of formality in the marriage of the parents.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator does not understand me. I do not want to cut them off at all. I only want to know whether more than one woman can receive a pension for the services of one man.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Certainly not, only the woman with whom he lived a definite period, at least two years next preceding his enlistment. Those provisions are in the law already. I merely want to expand them a little so as to apply them a little further. As Senators are getting impatient, and as this subject may be one, looking at the source from which it comes, that should receive further investigation, I will move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next, and that in the meanwhile this amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope not. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion. It is very important that we should have an executive session for a few moments, and if the Senator from Missouri will withdraw the motion to adjourn, I will make that motion.

Mr. BROWN. I withdraw it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 13, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STEAMER DIANA.

Mr. DENNY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to issue an American register to the steamer Diana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHOLERA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As I am somewhat unwell, I ask leave of absence for one week.

There was no objection, and it was granted accordingly.

COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I was absent yesterday when the Committee on Territories was called. I ask now that it shall have two morning hours week after next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to two morning hours, as it has already had one.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It will displace no other committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I leave that matter to be decided when it comes up.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Say Thursday week.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose they are not called, will they come in?

The SPEAKER. The committee is now being called; it will come in again next Tuesday. The Chair hears no objection, and the committee will have next Thursday week.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask leave to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I find in the Titusville Herald of April 9, 1866, a report signed by J. T. Sawyer and E. W. Matthews, a committee, so styling themselves, of the oil producers of western Pennsylvania. They state in that report that they came to Washington on the 12th of February, and remained here until the 24th of March, using their best endeavors to secure the repeal of the tax on crude petroleum. In another part of their report it is stated that they found on the part of the Representatives from western Pennsylvania entire indifference to the petroleum interest, and they conclude thus:

"Thus it appears that the producers of petroleum in Pennsylvania are not represented by men from their own vicinity, not even by men from their own State, but they are almost exclusively dependent for the protection of their interests in Congress upon the courtesy of Representatives from other States, among whom General JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio, is particularly deserving of the gratitude of every inhabitant of this section of country, since whatever prospects there may be for the repeal of this burdensome tax, they are due to his faithful and persistent efforts, and from present appearances he is the only advocate of this measure through whom any relief may be expected in the future."

I wish to say, in relation to this, that prior to the 12th day of February, when this committee say they came here, upon consultation with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I was informed that the entire tax upon crude petroleum would be removed by the committee. The chairman said that that was his own opinion, and from his consultation with the other members of the committee he was sure that it would be agreed to.

I never saw Mr. Matthews to my recollection, and Mr. Sawyer only once, and then he called me out during the session of the House. I gave him then the information which I had derived from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I never saw him again, and as it was unnecessary for him to remain, I supposed he had gone home. This charge of negligence against the Representatives of western Pennsylvania, (I can speak not only for myself, but my colleagues also) is entirely groundless. I have frequently consulted with them upon the subject, and all agreed in pressing the removal of the tax on crude petroleum. I wish now to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who knows something of what I have done in relation to this subject, whether I have, either at this session or during the last Congress, neglected in any way the interest of the oil producers, and whether I have not on all occasions, in season and out of season, beset them to remove this tax on crude petroleum as well as reduce that on refined.

Mr. MORRILL. Those members who were present whenever this subject has been acted upon heretofore will all bear witness to the zeal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] in endeavoring to remove or to reduce the tax upon petroleum. Early in the present session he was several times at my desk in relation to this subject, and I gave him distinctly to understand that it was in my opinion the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means to entirely remove the tax on crude petroleum, and he need therefore have no anxiety on the subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress [Mr. STEVENS] a similar question.

Mr. STEVENS. We all recollect—all the members of the committee—that during the last Congress we were, I will not say importuned, but very much visited by the gentleman from the Erie district [Mr. SCOFIELD] upon this subject, protesting against the tax we were then about to put upon crude petroleum. The committee, however, agreed to the tax finally fixed, and it may be within the recollection of others than myself that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] made not only a persistent but some of us thought unreasonable effort to have the tax reduced or taken off. And I will say further, although he may not think it much in his praise, that when he did not succeed he became somewhat offended, and by several subsequent motions which were made sought to retaliate upon those who went against him on the taxing of petroleum. I thought for one that he was too persistent in his efforts in favor of that interest.

Mr. GRINNELL. Let me say that at the last session I denominated the gentleman from the Erie district [Mr. SCOFIELD] the "free-light man," and I think he deserved the honor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield now for a few moments to my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say for myself that on more than one occasion I have called on the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on this very subject, and have submitted a memorial on the subject to that committee. I have conversed, also, with General GARFIELD, of Ohio, on the subject.

Intelligent gentlemen from my district have been here, and have been at my room over and over again. I gave them the same assurance that my colleague from the Erie district says he gave these gentlemen who have misrepresented the action of the Representatives from western Pennsylvania. I have talked with all of them, and it is the universal opinion of the delegation that this tax should be reduced or perhaps entirely abrogated. These gentlemen have done injustice, and I presume intentional injustice, to the members from western Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield for a few moments to my colleague from the Pittsburg district, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I want to say a word upon this subject, but not for the purpose of excusing myself for anything I have done or failed to do. At the last session of Congress when the question of taxing petroleum crude was before the House I was in favor of the tax and advocated it strongly, and know that in so doing, I incurred the displeasure of the gentlemen who have made this report and the persons they represent. I thought then that this petroleum interest should contribute something toward the payment of the interest on our debt. I was in favor of the tax for that reason. I have found that in practice it works badly and operates very unfavorably on small wells and small dealers. I think the taxation should be laid on the large wells only, and I would like to see something of that kind done. I do not see, however, how it can well be done.

The gentlemen who have made this report through the newspapers, when they were here called on me, and I gave them the same assurances which my colleague from the Erie district gave them; I told them that, from my intercourse with other members of the Committee of Ways and Means, I had reason to believe that the tax would be repealed. I told them that I was in favor of taking it off, and that I had no doubt the Committee of Ways and Means would so report. I can only say that I am astonished that they should have made such a report as they have. The gentleman from the Erie district talked with me very frequently on this subject, urging the taking off of the tax, even before he had any knowledge of this committee being here; and he had assurances from me and from other members of the Committee of Ways and Means that we believed it would be taken off.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have only to say further that I do not wish in any way to detract from the credit given to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He deserves, perhaps, all that is said of him, and the delegation from western Pennsylvania deserve none of the slander that is heaped upon them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to say a word?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say in regard to this matter, that I knew of no such report as this being in the newspapers until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] read it this morning. As a member of the committee this subject was in part referred to me, and two delegations came on here from Pennsylvania, some of the members of which were personally known to me, and they came to me. I assisted them in getting facts from the internal revenue department, as I would have done any other committee, and I assured them also that I had looked into the subject and believed that crude petroleum ought to be exempted from duty.

I am surprised at these statements made reflecting on the members from Pennsylvania, because I know that three of them have spoken to me several times upon the subject.

I suppose the chief reason why these parties came to me was in consequence of a previous acquaintance, and also for the reason that the Representative of the oil region proper [Mr. CULVER] has hardly been in his seat this session.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for bills of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where the call rested on last Friday.

JOSEPH BRAGDON, JR.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Bragdon, jr.; and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 31) entitled "An act to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;" when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (H. R. No. 150) for the relief of the administrators and securities of Almon W. Babbitt, late secretary of Utah; and

An act (H. R. No. 471) to provide that the "Soldier's Individual Memorial" shall be carried through the mails at the usual rate of printed matter.

MRS. MARTHA MCCOOK.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back House joint resolution No. 46, for the relief of Martha McCook, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The joint resolution was read. It provides a pension of $300 per annum to Mrs. Martha McCook, of Jefferson county, Ohio, during her natural life, on account of the loss of her unmarried sons, Charles M. McCook and Brigadier General Robert L. McCook.

The substitute proposes to give Mrs. Martha McCook an annuity during her natural life of $250 per annum, to be paid semi-annually, in consideration of the services of her husband and eight sons in the late war, four of whom have died of wounds received in service.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, in submitting this resolution it seems proper that I should state briefly the reasons which have actuated the committee in recommending to the House its favorable consideration.

The resolution proposes to grant to Mrs. Martha McCook an annuity of $250 per annum during life. The distinguished services of the McCook family and their sacrifices are familiar to every reader who has kept pace with the rapid events which have passed in such quick succession during the past five years, yet I deem it not out of place, as it is the base upon which this resolution stands, to recapitulate what may be, and I have no doubt is, familiar to every member of this House.

At the commencement of the recent war, when the unity and perpetuation of our Government were threatened by the rebellion of the so-called confederate States, nine of this family, all of its male members, with that patriotic impulse which characterized the uprising of the people of the loyal States, promptly entered the service, and by their long and distinguished services and many sacrifices proved their earnestness and enduring devotion to the Union cause.

Major Daniel McCook, the lamented husband of Mrs. Martha McCook, was mortally wounded at the battle of Buffington Island, Ohio, and died July 21, 1863.

Captain John James McCook served on General Crittenden's staff, and was severely injured in the neck by the effects of a large shot.

Major Latimore A. McCook, acting assistant surgeon of the thirty-fifth Illinois volunteers, was wounded twice.

Colonel George W. McCook, ninety-sixth Ohio volunteers, organized five regiments, and took the field himself.

Major General Alexander McDowell McCook commanded the right wing of the army of the Cumberland, and is still in the service.

Brevet Brigadier General Edwin Stanton McCook was wounded three times, and while engaged before Vicksburg was stricken down with sunstroke, from the effects of which he will never recover. This officer was engaged in thirty-eight battles.

Private Charles Morris McCook, company F, second Ohio volunteers, was mortally wounded at the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, and died two days after, he at the time being but seventeen years of age.

Brigadier General Robert L. McCook, when sick and on his way to a hospital, was captured in his ambulance and savagely murdered by his captors August 6, 1862, he having been engaged in many battles.

Brigadier General Daniel McCook was mortally wounded at Kenesaw Mountain June 27, 1864, and died July 18, 1864.

Midshipman J. J. McCook died on board the flagship Delaware, March 30, 1842.

Including the last named we have ten out of one single family who have been actually engaged in the military and naval service of the country, four of whom were killed or died from wounds received in action, one died from sickness, three severely injured or wounded in the service, and but two of the ten escaping unharmed from the casualties of war.

Mr. Speaker, this is a record of which a nation may well feel proud. I do not know that in the history of the world there is a parallel case, none I am certain in the history of our own country, where so many of one family have rendered such distinguished service, and so many, by their own merit, bravery, and gallant conduct on the field, entitled themselves to the high and elevated rank which many of them attained.

The object of this resolution is that the nation should, in a substantial and fitting way, acknowledge the unparalleled services of a single family to the country in the hour of its peril, and to express its gratitude to a lady who gave birth to so many children, and to console with her in her bereavement for the loss of husband and sons whose lives have been given that their country might live.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard of but one objection to the passage of this resolution, and that is its tendency to open the way for admitting applicants for annuities for like services and sacrifices. This objection may in truth be well founded. Of this, however, I have many doubts; but if it be so, I shall be thankful and rejoice to know it, and will take great pleasure in doing what I can to recognize their services in as public and as substantial a manner as this resolution proposes to recognize the proud record of the family of the McCooks.

Now, unless some gentleman desires to speak upon this joint resolution, I will call the previous question.

Mr. PERHAM. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] will not call the previous question until the minority of the committee have been heard.

Mr. TAYLOR. I withdraw the call for the previous question for the present.

Mr. PERHAM. I desire to submit a minority report, which I ask to have read.

The report was read. It states that while the minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions recognize fully the distinguished services of the McCook family, they are unable to see why, from all the widows and mothers who have given their husbands and sons to their country's cause, this one should be selected to receive this compliment and substantial aid. The precedent would be a dangerous one, and if followed and a similar gratuity given to all who might as reasonably claim it, the draft upon the national Treasury would be very large. Many thousands of fathers and mothers who have given all their sons to the service will feel that their claims are as good as this. Some have already applied for pensions, and their applications must be responded to favorably or they will feel that injustice has been done them. Mrs. McCook is now in the receipt of a pension of $300 per annum, to which she is entitled by the death of her husband in the service. The minority of the committee therefore recommend that Mrs. McCook be allowed to take, instead of the amount she now receives, a pension for the loss of her son, Brigadier General Robert L. McCook, which would be $360 per annum; and report an amendment to that effect.

The amendment of the minority was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Martha McCook, the widow of Daniel McCook and the mother of Robert L. McCook, at the rate of thirty dollars per month during her widowhood, in lieu of the pension she now receives of twenty-five dollars per month.

Mr. PERHAM. I was one of the minority committee who were unable to come to the same conclusion to which the majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions arrived in regard to this subject. I have no reason to detract at all from the just meed of praise that is due to this McCook family. I am willing to grant all that is claimed in that respect.

But the question arises whether this country, in its present financial embarrassment, is in a condition to allow this class of stipends to all the mothers and fathers who have given their sons to the service of their country. There are thousands of instances of poor mothers who have been left, it may be, with a large family of small children on their hands for support, who are receiving pensions of but eight dollars per month, yet who have given to the country all they had to give. Many of them have lost sons in the service, and the minority of the committee are unwilling to select this one case, this one lady, this one mother, however worthy she may be, and give to her this stipend of the Government while others are excluded. The committee already have submitted to them for consideration one case very similar to this in regard to which they have presented an adverse report. They have now before them the case of a father who claims that he has given to the service seven sons and one grandson, and he asks that some consideration of this kind be granted to him. The minority of the committee fear the precedent which would be established by the passage of the bill now under consideration, and therefore they object to its passage.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman mean to say that in the instance he referred to the seven sons and a grandson were killed in the service?

Mr. PERHAM. They were not killed but were in the service.

Mr. THAYER. That is a very material difference; and that distinguishes very decidedly the case which he puts from the case now under consideration.

Mr. PERHAM. The gentleman will bear in mind that all the sons of Mrs. McCook were not killed.

Mr. THAYER. Four of them were killed in addition to her husband.

Mr. PERHAM. The minority of the committee desire that this question shall be presented distinctly, and shall be decided by the House with a full understanding of the precedent which will be established by the passage of this bill. The action of the House on this case may be regarded as an instruction to the committee in similar cases which we now have before us, and others which must come before us.

The minority of the committee propose that the pension which Mrs. McCook is now receiving shall be increased from twenty-five to thirty dollars per month, thus giving her the pension to which she would be entitled in consequence of the death of her son, who was a brigadier general, instead of the pension for the death of her husband, who was a major.

Mr. EGGLESTON. It is very seldom, Mr. Speaker, that I attempt to say anything in this House; but on a question of this kind, in relation to which I have some knowledge of the facts of the case, I cannot remain silent and hear gentlemen on this floor depreciate the services of the brave and noble family to whom allusion has been made. The McCook family are, in Ohio, truly called the "fighting family."

Mrs. McCook has lost four sons in this war; and last of all, by a dispensation of divine Providence, her husband was taken while trying to stay the ravages of that desperado Morgan, who marched through the State of Indiana, and nearly through the State of Ohio.

I say that this House should indorse the report of the majority of the committee, and thus signify our appreciation of the patriotism of this family. The majority propose that we shall give this widow $250 per annum, in addition to the twenty-five dollars per month which she is now receiving; and this proposition should receive the approval of the House. There need be no fear that any other case like this will ever come before this Congress. The records of this war may be searched in vain to find another family like the McCook family. I for one, as a Representative from Ohio, shall take pleasure in voting for the proposition submitted by the majority of the committee; and if any gentleman in this House can present any similar case or cases I am ready to vote for a like appropriation in such cases.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have the credit, whether I deserve it or not, of being very liberal in my votes in this House, and I desire to be so on this occasion. But before I vote, I desire to inquire in regard to another very large class for whom I do not see any immediate prospect of provision being made. I wish to inquire in regard to the poor widows and mothers of private soldiers and maimed men with large families receiving eight dollars per month. Here is the case of a noted woman, honored in being the mother of a numerous, brave family. She is now receiving something like $300 a year from the Government. That is well. But when it is proposed to double this pension because this lady had the honor to be the mother of such sons, one of whom now enjoys a lucrative foreign mission, while there are so many others who are deserving and absolutely indigent, I cannot see the propriety of supporting such a proposition; certainly when it sets a precedent which may involve the expenditure of millions of dollars.

Now, sir, I wish to state a fact in regard to my own State in connection with this proposed liberality. When we were raising troops one thousand brave men of our State, mainly above forty-five years of age, some of whom had sons, and even grandsons in the service of the country, were willing to enlist for the war. They supposed, of course, that they would receive the same treatment in reference to bounty, &c., as other troops. So far did this understanding extend that even the paymaster gave them a portion of their bounties. But when they were mustered out of service, one third and more of their number having died or become unfit for duty, the bounty which they had received was deducted from their pay, being at once a mortification and a hardship.

By a bill we have sought to redress this wrong to the sacrificing "grey-beards" of the war above forty-five years of age, many of whom went home, or the place they left as home, to find their houses burned in some instances, and their property gone, thus left poor, dependent upon their relatives, or thrown back years financially. Now, the Government has not the charity or the justice even to give back to these men a part of the bounty.

Now, sir, before I vote this to the mother or the father of any major general, I shall ask justice to be done to these "grey-beards," men, though above forty years of age, doing their duty well. I tell you there are poor men now dependent upon scanty means we should first look to. I tell you they were brave men, and deserve something from the Government if we have charities to bestow. But here is the difference in this case. It is for the private soldier, for the poor, that we are called to legislate. Let us do that before we double the pensions of those who are now already well to do in this world, and who can rest upon their honors until families in absolute want are provided for.

I ask the Clerk to read what I send up.

Mr. MOULTON. It is a case from Illinois, and I want her to be heard from.

The Clerk read, as follows:

ASSESSOR'S OFFICE,
UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
SEVENTH DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS,
PARIS, March 8, 1886.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I see by the papers that some gentleman of your House has been introducing some resolution of thanks or compliments to some gentleman that had five sons in the Union Army. Now, I wish to put in your hands this case: Mrs. Imogene Buckingham, of this county, had eight sons and three grandsons in the Union Army, two were killed at Shiloh, the other six lived through, and were all honorably discharged. One of her grandsons was badly wounded at Kennesaw. The names of these sons are as follows, namely:

Samuel Buckingham, company A, seventh regiment Illinois cavalry; Edson Buckingham, in a California regiment; John Buckingham, in a Missouri regiment; Joseph Buckingham, in an Iowa regiment; Benjamin Buckingham, in a twentieth Illinois regiment, dead; Charles M. Buckingham, in a twenty-ninth Illinois regiment, dead; Jacob Buckingham, in a twenty-ninth Illinois regiment; Elijah Buckingham, in a twenty-ninth Illinois regiment.

She is a widow, and has been for sixteen years, and in abject poverty; is sixty-seven years old; a woman of fine native sense; was born in Fairfield county, town of Brookfield, Connecticut; her maiden name was Imogene Campbell; married 3d of August, 1817, in Brookfield, Connecticut, to Philip Buckingham.

She is now living all alone, about five miles from this place; has lived in this county about twenty-five years.

The reason I have been thus particular and minute is to enable you if possible to procure her a special pension, as all of those that died had heirs of their own. These facts are all as I have stated them. See what can be done. She does not own one foot of land. The case is now with you.

Hoping that something may be done for this noble old Yankee mother, I am, with respect, your obedient servant,

O. W. RIVES,

Assessor Seventh District Illinois.

Hon. S. W. MOULTON, Washington, D. C.

I indorse the above statement as true to the best of my knowledge and belief. T. C. W. SALE.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have had cases presented to my consideration where there were six, and in one case seven, in one family who have served as privates, when the family itself was poor. Should I not appeal in vain to this House for money for them? I choose to consider the claim of our "grey-beards" and those with unequal bounties and the most needy first.

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this case, which strikes me as an extraordinary one, is in my judgment just; and it will give me great pleasure to vote for the report of the majority of the committee, and I think the time has now come in the affairs of the country when we should turn our attention to those who have labored in defense of the Union when our Government was sorely imperiled.

I am told, sir, that this family of McCook, consisting of ten, had all of its male members engaged in this war. I believe that it is a sacred trust confided to us to reward the widows and orphans our brave soldiers have left behind them. It is our duty to do so for the invaluable services the soldiers have rendered the country. We are spending millions of dollars for purposes not half so humane, not half so charitable, as that which is here proposed to those who have shown so much bravery as this McCook family. It was proposed that the Government should be put to an expense of over fifty million dollars annually to keep up a Freedmen's Bureau for the support of a class of persons who are unwilling to earn their own living. The gentleman from Iowa who preceded me was willing to vote that, while he is unwilling to vote for this small stipend to a family whose members have behaved so gallantly in defense of the Union. I am not only not afraid to vote for this proposition for this poor woman, but I am willing to support the widows and orphans left behind by our brave soldiers. I am willing also to grant bounty, so far as the financial condition of the country will allow, to all of our brave soldiers who have periled their lives during the war while other men were sitting at their ease in safe places.

Mr. SCHENCK. And when "copperheads" were assailing them in the rear.

Mr. ROGERS. It is immaterial to me whether these parties are "copperheads" or not, so long as they did their duty gallantly. I do not care in these cases what a man's politics may be. I understand the father of this family, although too old to be enlisted, lost his life while in service against one of Morgan's raids, while many who were better able to bear arms shirked their responsibility. I hope no man on either side of the House will have the meanness to record his vote against this brave family which has done its duty to the country so well.

Mr. SCHENCK. I said these men were fighting the rebels in front while copperheads were attacking them in the rear. I did not call the soldiers "copperheads."

Mr. ROGERS. I understand this old man McCook served in the Army although he could not be drafted, when those who oppose this measure were safe at home in palatial residences.

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WHALEY.]

Mr. WHALEY. I rise to indorse what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EGLESTON,] and I wish to say that I for one am willing to vote to tax the people to the utmost extent in behalf of the suffering widows and mothers of our brave soldiers. And I regret to see that members on this floor are opposed to granting relief to this old lady. I am not here to speak in praise of the McCooks. Their history is too well known. Their bravery is shown by the fact that there were ten sons in the Army, three of whom were generals, all of whom, I believe, rose from the ranks. Such a remarkable family in that respect, perhaps, was never known in history.

I would not oppose this increase of pension to this lady on the ground that she may not need it. The fact is she does need it, otherwise there would have been no application to Congress for it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. As one of the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I was unable to agree with the majority of the committee who reported this bill. Here is a proposition that is very unusual in its character in the legislation of this country. Mrs. McCook is already in the enjoyment of a pension of $300 a year, granted to her by the Department in consequence of the death of her husband.

It is said that this is a celebrated family. In regard to that I am not going to take issue with any one. But for that they should receive the same consideration that every other celebrated family is entitled to, no more and no less.

It is said that this is a fighting family. For that they are entitled to the same consideration that the hundred thousand other fighting families of this country are entitled to.

It is said that this family suffered greatly during the war. That is undoubtedly true; but gentlemen must recollect that there are a hundred thousand other families that have suffered just as much consequent upon this rebellion.

It is said that the McCook family have contributed the entire male portion of it to the Army of the United States. I can tell gentlemen that there are thousands of families that have done the same thing in various parts of the country. I can point to families of constituents of mine every male member of which has laid down his life for his country in this war, and those who survive are in the greatest penury, and yet not one of them can obtain relief under the pension laws. And not only have they suffered in this way, but they have lost every vestige of property that they had. All has been destroyed, and perhaps a weeping mother is left in penury and want. Before I vote for this bill I wish to see these other thousands who are in need provided for by the Government of the United States.

There is no pretense that the McCook family are in destitute circumstances. One of them is now occupying a high position in the United States Army, an officer of high rank. Certainly one, and I do not know but more than one. There is no pretense that Mrs. McCook is in want at all. For that reason, if for no other, I am opposed to setting aside the thousands who are in actual want and providing for this particular case.

I am not disposed to detract anything from the merits of this family. They are entitled to all the credit that is accorded to them; but they are no more meritorious than many another family that has done as much and suffered as much during the war as this.

Then, again, I am opposed to setting a precedent in the passage of this bill, which proposes to grant an annuity, not a pension. I am not aware that there is a case in the history of this Government of the character here proposed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to address the House for a few minutes only upon this question. It was my good fortune to represent for years the district in which this family resided and in which all the sons of this lady were born and raised. I have been acquainted with this family from my boyhood. I never was associated with them politically. I come before the House to-day, as I trust I shall come before the House upon all occasions upon questions of this sort, to insist that something like equal justice be done by this Government in granting special pensions. I do not see the distinction, and I do not think the people of this country will see the distinction, that is attempted to be made here between widows who are to have special pensions for services rendered by their husbands and sons during the war and their loss by battle. If gentlemen have any trouble on the subject of the word "annuity" in this bill, let it be stricken out and the word "pension" substituted. The words are convertible terms, and amount to one and the same thing. But there are gentlemen here who object to this bill because of the word "annuity," simply because they claim that the grant of annuities is a departure from the general rule in granting the pensions. It is further objected that the grant of a special pension is a dangerous departure from the general policy of the country and a bad precedent. If gentlemen will refer to the records of the Congress of the United States they will find that special pensions have frequently been granted, and that even in the last Congress this very departure from the general law was made in three instances: in the case of General Baker, who had been a colonel and was a brigadier general by brevet, which he never accepted; in the case of General Berry, and in the case of General Whipple. The last Congress allowed a pension of $600 annually to the widows or families of each of these officers. I would like to know why this discrimination is to be made in this case against this lady. Do gentlemen say that the wife of a fallen hero is entitled to more consideration than the mother who bore him?

Gentlemen talk here about remembering the poor. I trust they will remember the poor, and that the American people will remember the poor among the survivors of the heroes of this war for the life of the Republic.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill for the relief of Elisha W. Dunn, a paymaster in the United States Navy, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MRS. MARTHA M'COOK—AGAIN.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this lady—and it is certainly not to her discredit to say it—was left, when her husband fell upon the field, without any property of any kind, and dependent exclusively upon the affection which might be shown her by her surviving children.

It is but justice that I should further say that one of her sons, as I was informed by her daughter, protested against his mother accepting any pension from the Government, and claimed the privilege of being himself her protector and supporter when he took her, in her widowhood, to the shelter of his own roof-tree, where she is to-day.

But, sir, there is a peculiar reason why it is that this additional pension is asked by this old lady at the hands of the American Congress. It is this: she has not only lost her husband and her three sons, all of whom either fell in battle or perished of honorable wounds received in battle, but she has cast upon her care and keeping to-day another of those heroic sons, who, after going through thirty-eight battles in the late war for the Union, and being twice wounded nigh unto death, was brought home to her shattered in every nerve of his organization, and as helpless as a child.

Mr. PERHAM. Has not he a pension?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not that I know of. I have never inquired. I know that this lady had received no pension from the Government, and no proposition was made to grant her any until within the last ninety or hundred days, after I introduced this bill for her relief. Her sands of life are well-nigh run, and I want to know of gentlemen who voted to give $600 a year to the widow of General Baker, and the same pension to the widows of General Berry and General Whipple, how they can go before the American people dickering about the difference between $250 and $60 a year. That is the question, and the only question, now before the House on the reports of the committee. The Committee on Pensions, both the majority and minority, report in favor of an increase of pension. The majority report in favor of an increase of $250 annually of this lady's pension, and the minority report in favor of increasing it only sixty dollars annually; the whole committee, therefore, agree that there ought to be an increase of her pension.

The simple question, therefore, is, whether or not we shall adopt the suggestion of the minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and thereby save the sum of $190 annually and no more, on account of this increased pension proposed by the majority. That is the only question before us. With all respect, it seems to me that to reject the majority report in order to save annually the sum of $190 by withholding it from this lady is not a wise economy.

Now, in regard to the services of this family. I beg leave to say that I was here in my place in the discharge of my public duty when the first battle was fought in Virginia in the great struggle for the preservation of the Republic.

This old man, Major McCook, the husband of this lady, without belonging to any company whatever, rushed to the front upon his own account and upon his own responsibility, and participated in the battle of the 21st of July, 1861, from its beginning to its close. Upon the retreat, when near Centreville, his young son Charley, aged seventeen, who had volunteered from his school-room at Gambier, Knox county, Ohio, to fight for the Union, was overtaken by the pursuing rebels and ordered to surrender. His father called to him, "Charley, surrender." The boy's voice was heard to respond, "Father, I can never surrender to traitors." And he fell, pierced with the bullets of the enemy, one of the first martyrs of the Republic. I went with his stricken-hearted mother to lay his mangled body in its last resting-place in the Congressional burying-ground.

From that day forward to the end of the struggle, every male member of this household was found in the ranks of the defenders of the country; being the surviving seven brothers and the father. Three of them have also fallen in battle, and one is now at home in the care of his mother, his constitution shattered, a miserable wreck, never again to enjoy health and comfort in this life.

And yet members here urge the importance of saving $190 per annum in this case. It may be so; but for myself I will say, that whenever a like case is presented here from any quarter by any one of a whole family having rendered such service in the late war for the Union, the half of them having been killed outright, I will gladly vote for a like pension or annuity, and will not falter whatever word may be employed in the bill to designate the compensation.

I trust, however, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] will consent to strike out the word "annuity" and insert the word "pension" in its place, for the purpose of removing the scruples of gentlemen.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. TAYLOR. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. But a few minutes. The gentleman can resume the floor whenever he desires.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary, I trust, while opposing this bill, for any gentleman on this floor to say that he does not fail to bear full and ample testimony to the courage of this McCook family, or of any member of it. For one, I most cheerfully bear my testimony to that effect. I knew the father of these children who fought so bravely and so well. I knew some of the children; one of them was the colonel of an Illinois regiment, and distinguished himself on all the fields where he served.

But this is a question that rises somewhat above these personal considerations; and I trust the House will understand this matter before they establish the precedent here recommended.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is a little mistaken, I perceive, in one particular. I have before me the joint resolution introduced by him; it is in his own handwriting. It is not like the one to which he referred as forming a precedent for the passage of this joint resolution. His joint resolution provides that there shall be paid to Mrs. Martha McCook a pension to the amount of $300 per annum, not on account of the services of her husband, who, it is alleged, fell in the service, but on account of the loss of two unmarried sons, therein named, who fell in the war against the rebellion. That is the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio. I say it is entirely exceptional, and that no such bill has ever, to my knowledge, been passed by Congress.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported a substitute which the House is now called upon to pass, which substitute is also exceptional.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] allow me to say a word right here?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. When the joint resolution was introduced to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred, Mrs. McCook was drawing no pension, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has already stated. That joint resolution was intended to provide her a pension. Since then she has obtained the pension the joint resolution asked for, and the substitute of the majority now proposes to give her $250 per annum in addition.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then the object of my friend from Ohio has already been accomplished.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all; she never got the pension asked for. The joint resolution asked for a pension for the loss of her sons.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then the gentleman from Ohio wants a double pension?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly I do.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then we come to the substitute reported by the majority of the committee. I say it is exceptional, and if the House establishes that precedent I do not know what point we may ultimately reach.

Mr. Speaker, whatever I might be disposed to do for Mrs. McCook in the way of voting a sum of money absolutely, as a testimonial from Congress in consideration of the bravery of her sons, I must object to the passage of any such bill as this. I would be willing to vote in favor of giving Mrs. McCook a sum of money absolutely. Such a proposition would be much preferable to this.

Mr. BINGHAM. All that I desire is that justice shall be done in this matter; and I am willing to move an amendment providing that there be paid to Mrs. McCook a gratuity of $1,500, instead of the yearly sum here proposed.

The SPEAKER. That amendment would not be in order now. There is pending a substitute, to which an amendment has been offered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The amendment might be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. Such a proposition as that could not receive unanimous consent. I must object, for one.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] now yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman, but he wishes to advocate the amendment emanating from the minority of the committee. I have already given two gentlemen of the minority an opportunity to advocate their views, and I must decline to yield further.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman whether it is his intention to call the previous question and cut off debate on the minority report. As a member of the committee, I claim the right to say something upon that minority report.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that there has been full opportunity afforded for the presentation of the views of the minority, and I decline to yield further. There are scarcely fifteen minutes of the morning hour remaining.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I hope that the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] have said that there is no precedent for the action proposed in this bill. Those gentlemen are at fault in their knowledge of the legislation of the country. It will be found that in 1814, a gratuity of $200 a year during life was granted to Mrs. Mary Cheever, on account of the distinguished services of her two sons, who were seamen on board the frigate Constitution, and were killed in the capture of the British frigate Java. This, so far as I know, is the only case exactly in point. In the course of the discussion of that case in Congress, it was proposed to make it a pension; but that word was rejected for the express purpose of making that a case distinct from all others, precisely what this joint resolution proposes with reference to this McCook family.

I cite also the case of the widow of Commodore Perry, who, in 1821, was granted an annuity of $400 a year during life, and also an annuity of $150 for each of four children. That also is a case analogous to this. Gentlemen, therefore, need not urge the objection that the passage of this joint resolution will establish a precedent, because the precedent has already been established years ago.

I desire also to call the attention of the House to the fact that no longer ago than the last session of Congress, pensions of $600 each were granted to the widows of three distinguished generals—Generals Baker, Berry, and Whipple. The annuity of $250 which this resolution proposes to give Mrs. McCook will, with the pension which she is already receiving, make $550—fifty dollars less than the annuity granted in similar cases by the last Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question, so that the whole case may be heard.

Mr. TAYLOR. But a few minutes of the morning hour remain, and I must insist on the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 49, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. TAYLOR and PERHAM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-three, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered, which was upon the amendment of Mr. PERHAM to the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 69, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Deftoe, Farnsworth, Ferry, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McKee, Mercur, Moulton, Paine, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Shanklin, Smith, Stevens, T. Woodbridge, Unson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kelley, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, McCullough, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Sülwell, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Whaley—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Culton, Culver, Darling, Daves, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, William Lawrence, Le Bond, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, Morrill, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Strouse, Trimble, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—66.

So the substitute of the minority was disagreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. HALE stated that Mr. Woodbridge was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The substitute of the majority of the committee was adopted.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SMITH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 42, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Bromwell Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hayes, Henderson, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester H. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kelley, Keiso, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McKuer, Miller, Moore, Paul, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Orth, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stillwell, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Van Aernam, Durt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Welker, and Whaley—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Cobb, Conkling, Deftrees, Ferry, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hill, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ketcham, Marvin, McKee, Mercer, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Ritter, Rollins, Shanklin, Smith, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—42.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Culom, Culver, Darling, Daves, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hart, Higby, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Ladin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, Morrill, Moulton, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—68.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the naval appropriation bill. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one, five, six, ten, and eleven, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their fourth amendment.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment and also the clause of the bill to which it was attached, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "For the preservation and necessary repairs of the property of the United States at the Pensacola navy-yard, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

That the Senate agree to so much of the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike out of said amendment the following words: "the same as those rates received at Boston, New York, and Washington;" and agree to the matter proposed to be inserted by the House, and that the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from so much of their amendment to the ninth amendment of the Senate as proposes to strike out the second clause of said amendment; and that the Senate agree to so much of the amendment of the House to said Senate amendment as proposes to strike out the words "foundry and," in the fourth clause of said amendment.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the twelfth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the sixth section of the bill in the following words:

"If approved by the Secretary of the Navy,"

JAMES W. GRIMES,

E. D. MORGAN,

T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

N. P. BANKS,

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

CHARLES E. PHELPS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague on the committee of conference, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] being sick and unable to attend the session of the House today, has sent me the papers and requested me to make the report. That is the reason why I make the report instead of the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House.

The principal differences between the House and the Senate were in regard to the purchase of the Oakman & Eldridge wharf, at the Charlestown navy-yard, and the proposition for the purchase of additional grounds adjoining the Naval School at Annapolis.

One of the members of the committee on the part of the Senate, Mr. GRIMES, who had made a personal examination of the grounds at Annapolis, was of opinion that this purchase should be made, and that the price at which it is offered to the Government is very cheap.

In reference to the purchase of Oakman & Eldridge's wharf, the Senate recede from their amendment.

These were the principal points of difference; the House receded in reference to the Annapolis appropriation, and the Senate receded in reference to the wharf purchase.

The other amendments were in the main merely verbal.

Mr. CHANLER. I did not distinctly hear what are the provisions made by the report in reference to the navy-yard on the Gulf. I would therefore ask the gentleman what appropriations are now made by the bill for the navy-yard at Pensacola.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There is an appropriation of $50,000 for the necessary repairs for preserving the navy-yard at Pensacola, but there is no appropriation for rebuilding the navy-yard at that point.

I do not think further discussion is necessary; and I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUARANTINE STATION, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 14th of March last, stating that he has no data by which to form an opinion as to the effect that the erection of a quarantine station will have upon the navigable waters of New York harbor; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE ASSASSINATION REWARDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 10th instant, in regard to the findings of the commissions in the case of the rewards for the capture of J. Wilkes Booth and David E. Harold; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of a letter from the Secretary of War stating the amounts paid to, and still claimed, by the Illinois Central Railroad Company for transportation, &c., for the Government, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary.

Also, informing the House that he had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 207) to amend an act to provide ways and means to support the Government, approved March 3, 1865;

An act (H. R. No. 223) to amend an act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 60) to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for moneys advanced Government for war purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 364) to confirm unto Augustin Amiot, his legal assigns and representatives, a certain lot of ground in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri;

An act (H. R. No. 349) for the relief of the estate of E. W. Eddy; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 105) giving construction to the law in relation to bounties payable to soldiers discharged for wounds.

ARMY BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business before the House was the consideration of the special order, being the bill to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I would inquire if the question before the House is not upon the substitute reported by the committee for the Senate bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no Senate bill before the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not this a substitute for the Senate bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, no; it is a House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is not now before the House. This is a House bill reported back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Chair will state that if there is no objection it will greatly facilitate business to have the substitute treated as an original bill reported by the committee; if treated as a substitute, but one amendment can be offered at a time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to make that very suggestion. This bill which the committee report is in fact an original bill.

The SPEAKER. If, then, there be no objection it will be treated as an original bill, and an amendment and an amendment to an amendment will be entertained.

No objection was made.

Mr. RAYMOND. I would like to inquire of the Chair to what subject the message just received from the President of the United States relates.

The SPEAKER. It has not yet been journalized by the Journal Clerk, but it is in regard to the fisheries.

Mr. RAYMOND. If it is not too long, I would like to have it read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must object to that, as the Army bill is the special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York can move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, and that will take the gentleman from Ohio off the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the gentleman only want it read?

Mr. RAYMOND. That is all.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to its being taken up for the mere purpose of reading. If a motion is made to take it up for action and I cannot resist that motion I must of course give way. I have no feeling about the matter, but the Army bill was made the special order for to-day, and it should not be shoved aside now.

Mr. RAYMOND. I will not press my request.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to suggest to the House, in behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, a mode of procedure in regard to the consideration of this bill which I trust will be satisfactory to all sides.

I propose that the bill, important as it is admitted upon all sides to be, shall first be read through, and then read section by section for amendment, as though in Committee of the Whole. When it shall have been read I shall ask the attention of the House for, I think, not more than fifteen or twenty minutes, in order that I may give the House some idea of the general features of the bill, of the line of legislation that the House committee has thought proper to pursue, as contradistinguished in some points from that which we find in the bill which has been sent to us from the Senate, and which has also been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and, as I do not mean to be interrupted during that fifteen minutes by anybody, I trust no gentleman will consider me discourteous if I do not yield the floor to him. But in order that every one may have a fair opportunity I propose not to call the previous question on the bill, but that it shall be considered section by section, so as to give gentlemen an opportunity to bring forward their amendments and present their views to the House. That, I think, is but fair.

I propose, however, that the debate shall be limited by general consent to ten-minute speeches, for five minutes is scarcely long enough. And I will not call the previous question except it be upon some particular section, the previous question to apply only to that particular section, if the discussion seems to run to an unreasonable length upon it, just as in Committee of the Whole the motion is made that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on a particular section.

My object is to secure a fair consideration to this bill, and upon the part of the Committee on Military Affairs to invite the aid of members of the House on all sides to perfect the bill and put it in such a shape as will secure the best organization for this great arm of the public defense. I will ask that this may be the general understanding.

Mr. THAYER, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. CHANLER objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; then if it shall become necessary, where it appears that this bill is made a peg to hang long speeches upon, I shall be compelled to call the previous question on the entire bill.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to submit a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] There may be more persons on this side of the House who by the arrangement he proposes may be cut off.

The SPEAKER. If objection is made to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] it cannot be adopted.

Mr. CHANLER. I only desire to have the arrangement fully understood before it is completed. And therefore I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio before this arrangement is made—

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. CHANLER] to withdraw his objection.

Mr. CHANLER. Well, I was about to do so without any appeal.

Mr. CONKLING. If my colleague will allow, I will say that it seems to me that the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is a very fair one. If my colleague across the way [Mr. CHANLER] and my colleague nearer to me [Mr. DAVIS] wish to make remarks to an extent greater than ten minutes they can make them now, and agree afterward to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and then we can go on and consider the bill.

Mr. CHANLER. I am very much obliged to my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] for his usual courtesy and kindness in taking the very words out of my mouth while I am upon the floor. I was about to make exactly the same suggestion. The only object I had in rising was to make the very suggestion, and in the very words that he has just made. I do not wish to debate the bill at large, but if any gentleman desires to debate it at large I propose that he shall have an opportunity to do so before the proposed arrangement shall be entered into. Then the gentleman from Ohio can bring forward his ten-minute limitation, and have the bill debated under that rule.

Mr. THAYER. I will withdraw my objection to the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, if he will agree to have speeches limited to fifteen minutes instead of ten minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thought that when I was willing to limit myself to fifteen minutes in the general explanation of the bill, ten minutes upon each amendment would be enough for members. My desire is to economize the time of the House, and to make this a business debate. It is not the desire of the committee, and certainly it is not my desire, that this Army bill shall be made a peg upon which to hang long speeches upon general subjects. And I do not think my friend from Pennsylvania has any desire to indulge in any such debate. If he thinks that ten minutes upon each amendment is not enough, then I will consent to the limitation of fifteen minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that we first hear the bill read through. We can then ascertain whether there is any desire for any general debate longer than the time which he has proposed.

Mr. SCHENCK. That was my proposition, that the bill be first read through, then I would make a brief explanation of the general character and object of the bill. After which the bill will be read section by section for amendment, during which time debate shall be limited to speeches of ten minutes each.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let the bill be read through before that arrangement is made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I give notice that I will submit that proposition to the House as soon as the bill shall have been read.

The bill was then read at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has suggested that the bill be read by sections for amendment, and that debate be limited to fifteen minutes. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to speak of the importance of the bill which we have now before us for consideration. It relates to the great arm of the public defense, to the number, classification, and condition of the troops necessary to constitute that arm as it shall hereafter be preserved for the public defense. This bill, embodying after much investigation and consideration the views of the Committee on Military Affairs, has been brought by them before the House with a request, heretofore made to the House and which I now repeat, that we shall have, as we progress with the bill, the aid of the Representatives here assembled in putting the bill, by any requisite amendments, in such a shape as will best accomplish its great objects and the good of the country, for which it is intended.

I have very little to say in regard to the general features of the bill except as they shall disclose themselves as we proceed in its consideration section by section, as the House has resolved to do. I will make, however, the general remark that this bill is framed in conformity to the views of the Lieutenant General of the Army, sanctioned by the Secretary of War, in so far as it regards the number of the standing Army proposed to be provided for the future protection of the country. According to the recommendations of those officers, it provides for an Army which shall consist of fifty thousand men, but with an organization capable of expansion to eighty-two thousand six hundred. Gentlemen may differ with each other and with the committee in regard to what should now be the number of the standing Army of these United States. I confess that the impression which has been upon my mind for many months, and which is not yet entirely removed, is that we ought to preserve an Army of at least one hundred thousand men. I, however, yield my own opinion upon that subject to the high authority of the Lieutenant General, whose view is concurred in by the Secretary of War in his report, and sanctioned, I believe, by the President in communicating to us that report. I have been willing to take the standard which they propose, and which has been embodied as one of the general features of this bill.

Some gentlemen, taking a different view, will doubtless claim that there ought to be either no standing army at all, or a very small one, perhaps not larger than that which existed before the war for the suppression of the rebellion, to serve only as a nucleus for expansion into such force as may be needed by the addition of the militia and volunteer forces of the country that may be called out in any emergency.

Without going into a detailed statement of the reasons which led to the conclusion arrived at by the Lieutenant General, by the Secretary of War, and by the committee, it will, in my opinion, be found that, in view of the vast extent of our sea-coast, requiring garrisons at different points, not only upon the Atlantic but also upon the Pacific, including the whole coast of California; considering also the numerous interior posts of the country, and the probable necessity, owing to the disturbed condition of the country, of keeping up here and there the nucleus of a force to be mobilized if occasion should require in the southern districts of this country, the general number agreed upon is by no means too great. Taking in view all these elements of calculation, bearing in mind the garrisons that will be necessary for all our military posts and for the Indian frontier, and the force that will be required for the various expeditions which must from time to time be undertaken, and the troops that may be requisite in different parts of the country for securing and preserving the public peace, the aggregate cannot properly be less than that which the committee have made the basis of their bill.

The bill which has been passed by the Senate, and which is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, does provide for a smaller number, but only in this one particular: the Senate proposes fifty as the number of infantry regiments, while we have provided for fifty-five, the latter being in accordance with the bill as originally proposed in the Senate, and in accordance with the recommendations of the Lieutenant General and the Secretary of War, this reduction of five regiments being apparently for the purpose of crowding out and getting rid of the Veteran Reserve corps. We retained the fifty-five regiments, using ten of them for the Veteran Reserve corps. They would have but fifty regiments, and have the whole fifty to the exclusion of that corps, or in providing for new officers outside of that corps hereafter to be retained in the service of the country.

Then as to the cost of the Army we propose, any gentleman who has looked at the public documents laid before the House is familiar with the fact that the appropriation made for the support of the Army and forces in the field during the last year of the rebellion was $516,000,000. The estimate, subject, however, to some small deductions for the reduction of officers made in our bill—the estimate submitted for an army to be retained such as we propose now by the bill before the House—was $33,000,000 in the aggregate, being about the sixteenth part of what it cost the country to retain the Army during the last year of the war.

Another feature in this bill, in which there is a slight difference, (and gentlemen have requested me to state the differences between this and the bill which passed the Senate,) is in the number of colored troops retained. The Senate propose eight regiments of colored troops. The House proposes eight regiments of colored troops so far as infantry are concerned. Two regiments, of the twelve regiments of cavalry provided for in both bills, in the Senate bill it is provided shall be colored cavalry. We have no such provision in the bill before the House.

The bill, as I have already intimated, reserves for use in the service of the country a body called the Veteran Reserve corps, made up of ten of the fifty-five regiments of infantry, eight others of the fifty-five being colored. I am aware there will be objection made in some quarters to this preservation of that organization, to this provision for its being continued. I will not now, but will in the course of the debate on the section, go into any argument in respect to the retention of that corps. I will but say that this corps, which sprung from the necessities of the war, which had its birth in the exigencies of that struggle, consisted of twenty-four regiments. It is proposed by the House bill, the features of which gentlemen desire to understand, to continue the Veteran Reserve corps, not to the number of twenty-four regiments, as provided for until the men were discharged on their election, but of ten regiments only, the officers to be taken from these regiments, not exclusively those who were officers of the twenty-four regiments which heretofore existed, but to be selected, by examination, from those officers and from all other wounded volunteer officers who may have the requisite qualifications; the corps to have among its members, so far as the enlisted men are concerned, such enlisted men as may be found fit for light or garrison duty of any kind to be assigned for the purpose in this corps, together with such others as may be required to make up the whole corps, and who would be rejected on medical inspection without any such provision of law.

Another feature of the bill is the preservation, as a distinct bureau, of the Provost Marshal General's office, the Provost Marshal General, and his assistants. That section is one which will be the subject of objections by gentlemen. It will be for consideration when we come to that section whether it shall be retained or not as a part of the bill. I only pause to say in regard to it now, as it will be fully discussed hereafter, that this was a great means for recruiting and keeping up the Army, and the committee thought some such bureau was necessary for the purpose of recruiting, as the mode of procedure heretofore in the Army has been for the most part a decided failure.

It will be observed that the committee has departed from another general feature as exhibited in the bill which the Senate has laid upon our table. I am only doing justice by saying that in the last modification to the bill which passed that branch the Senate introduced the same thing proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. We have not confined the selections of officers to be appointed to fill up original vacancies in the various arms of the service to volunteer officers as was originally done, but it is proposed to extend them to all volunteers, whether officers or soldiers, who can by examination prove themselves possessed of the requisite qualifications, having regard to services in connection with those qualifications.

There is another feature in the Senate bill differing very much from that contained in the substitute. There is a provision contained in one section of the Senate bill in regard to selections for the filling up of the officers of these newly organized regiments, that where two thirds shall be taken from the volunteer officers and soldiers, and the other third shall be selected at the discretion of the President from the regular Army and elsewhere, all the regular Army officers who have during the war commanded volunteer troops shall be counted either as regular Army officers or as volunteers. It struck the committee of the House that here was a provision by which it might be possible, though I do not say it was so, for the regular Army officers who had not been in command of volunteer troops during the war, to carry away the first third of the prizes, and then remit to the enjoyment of the other two thirds these regular Army officers who had commanded volunteer troops.

We do not adopt any such feature in the bill now proposed. And to avoid all possible mistake we have inserted in lieu of it a section providing that no officer of the regular Army who has commanded volunteer forces during the war, shall on that account be held to be a volunteer.

There is another provision that is new—a provision for revising the whole Army list, as it now stands, in order to determine what officers may properly be retained in the service. This may be thought very radical. It may be thought that men who have enjoyed the advantage of their commissions in the regular Army, whether appointed from the Military Academy, or from civil life, or from volunteers since the war began, should, by reason of being found now in the Army, continue there until regularly dismissed by court-martial, and in that manner alone.

The committee have thought otherwise, and that now, in this transition period, when we are establishing a new army as it were, taking the old Army and expanding and solidifying it, one mode of making the Army serviceable would be to have a general revision of all those who now constitute its officers, in order to determine whether they should all, or only a part of them, be retained. Accordingly we have introduced a provision which will not by any possibility interfere with many of the officers, and which may not interfere with any. And it is not a star-chamber mode of procedure, but a fair mode by which every Army service shall be represented in a general council of officers, who shall allow the whole Army list to be retained; certainly all against whom there is no objection. Then, in regard to others, they are to report, not that a particular officer shall be dismissed or deprived of his commission, but simply that he shall come before the board and have his whole case fairly examined, after which the board shall resolve whether he shall continue in the Army or not.

Mr. HALE. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. SCHENCK. Upon the whole, I prefer to withhold any further explanation now, and to make it upon the sections as they are reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor on each section.

The first section was reported, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the military peace establishment of the United States shall hereafter consist of five regiments of artillery, twelve regiments of cavalry, fifty-five regiments of infantry, the professors and corps cadets of the United States Military Academy, and such other forces as shall be provided for by this act, to be known as the Army of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill creates an army of fifty-five regiments of infantry. The bill that passed the Senate on the 6th of March last provided for the organization of fifty such regiments, and I have understood from officers of the Army that that number is deemed sufficient for the purposes of the country.

I have taken the trouble to ascertain what additional amount of expense this Government will be subjected to by reason of the increase from fifty to fifty-five infantry regiments. If you look at the pay proper of these five regiments alone, without regard to subsistence, clothing, and equipment, or to anything else, the number of men being limited to fifty in each company, as it is proposed to limit it by this bill, then the annual additional expense will be $828,869 90.

Then there are a great many contingencies connected with that service which have not gone into this computation, such as equipment, rations, forage, and everything of that nature.

Now, sir, if these five regiments proposed by this bill are not necessary for the country, I for one feel desirous that it should be relieved from this additional expense.

I have made this computation upon the basis of the minimum number provided by this bill.

But if the regiments are filled up to the maximum it will add $400,000 more for pay alone, making the whole amount upwards of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the additional five regiments, besides the expense of supporting them and keeping them in the field.

I am told, I do not know whether it be true or not, that this increase of regiments is in reference to the organization of the Veteran Reserve corps, and that it is designed to be the means of furnishing employment and subsistence to men in that corps. I submit that when it is known, as I believe every gentleman when he comes to reflect upon it will see and know, that this Veteran Reserve corps is composed of men who have been disqualified for active service in the field, and who are pronounced to be unfit for anything but light duty in fortifications, it will be seen that it will be wisdom on the part of the Government to increase the pensions of these men rather than to incur this additional expense for the purpose of putting men into the field who are not competent for the duties of the field.

I have no desire whatever to do any injustice to any man who has served under this Government during this war. But I wish to see the Army of the United States efficient, whether at post or in the field. And therefore I believe public policy demands that we should pension those who have been unfortunate, and keep up the most efficient organization it is possible for us to do in the field.

This bill contemplates that this Reserve corps shall be kept on post duty. Of course the officers of the regular Army are to be sent off into the field, where they will have no opportunities for the ordinary recreations or enjoyments which they may occasionally have under the present system of service. Now, this thing should be equalized; regiments which have been stationed in hot climates or at sickly posts in one season should be transferred to other posts as has been the practice of the Department heretofore, and thus we should have uniformity and fairness in the disposition of the Army.

These are the only remarks I desire to make on this section. I will move to strike out "fifty-five" and insert the word "fifty" before the words "regiments of infantry."

Mr. BLAINE. Without debating all the points raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] I would suggest to him to observe that this first section is rather a preamble to the bill, as it may be termed, than a part of the bill itself. The point at which he aims is entirely embraced in the fifth section of this bill; the question in regard to retaining the Veteran Reserve corps in service comes up directly in the consideration of that fifth section. And therefore I suggest to him to waive his motion to amend this first section, and make it when the fifth section shall be up for consideration. If his amendment shall be adopted there, of course the first section will be altered accordingly, as we alter the preamble to a bill or resolution after having changed the bill or resolution by amendment. I think if he will do that it will be more pertinent and more intelligible to the House.

Mr. DAVIS. Before I sit down, I desire to send up to the Clerk's desk a substitute which I propose to offer for this entire bill; it is the Senate bill on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The substitute cannot be acted upon now; it must be reserved until this bill shall have been perfected section by section. The gentleman can give notice of his intention to move a substitute at the proper time.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. DAVIS to the first section, to reduce the number of regiments from fifty-five to fifty.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me make a suggestion. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] involves a very wide discussion at a premature point. Now, I hope the gentleman will heed my suggestion, which is, that the point he desires to accomplish can be more directly reached by moving an amendment to the fifth section of this bill, and if the House agrees with him, then this first section can easily be changed to conform to his amendment to the other section. As debate under the fifteen-minute rule is very free, I would suggest to the gentleman to let this section be passed over for the present.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to accede to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] to pass over this section for the present, if it can be done without prejudice to what I want.

Mr. CONKLING. I would suggest that this question again comes up in section four, determining the organization of the infantry regiments, where it reads, "of ten regiments, to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps."

The SPEAKER. This first section can be passed over by general consent, and subsequently modified to correspond with whatever changes the House may make in other parts of the bill.

No objection was made.

Section two was then read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the five regiments of artillery provided for by this act shall consist of the five regiments now organized; and the first, second, third, and fourth regiments of artillery shall have the same organization as is now prescribed by law for the fifth regiment of artillery: Provided, That the regimental adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries shall hereafter be extra first lieutenants.

Mr. CHANLER. As I understand the arrangement made by the consent of the House just now, the first section of this bill is not now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The first section has been passed over by general consent, with the understanding that hereafter it shall be made to conform, in regard to the number of regiments, with the action of the House upon succeeding sections.

Mr. CHANLER. I desired to say a few words upon this first section, in reference to the general application of portions of it. But perhaps I can say what I have to say just as well upon this section.

My object in rising is to notice the very terse and clear statement, as well as the very full and fair statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCHENCK] in reference to the character and scope of this bill. I certainly feel inclined to congratulate the gentleman upon his kindness and consideration in accepting the suggestions of the Lieutenant General of the Army and the Secretary of War in behalf of retrenchment, and I think we may congratulate ourselves that the state of security of the country is the basis of that retrenchment; that we have no reason to apprehend that state of internecine war which has been made the ground for most of the bills presented to this House; and also that in the face of a foreign war we are prepared in the organization of the Army here proposed to meet any exigency which may arise.

This bill appears to pursue the same system of consolidation—whether with more success I cannot tell. The bill, coming before us now for the first time, has not yet been subjected to that analysis which its importance justifies. But, sir, the general features of the system proposed in the bill—the organization of the colored troops, of the Reserve corps, and of the Provost Marshal's Bureau; the fundamental alteration proposed with reference to the control of the Military Academy at West Point; the disposition manifested to exclude regular officers and to favor volunteer officers, as if the citizen who receives a military education at the expense of the Government should stand in an inferior position to him who enters a volunteer organization without such military education—a distinction for which I cannot see any good reason—all these points strike me with force on the first reading of the bill.

Now, sir, one great feature of this bill—the examining board—has been admitted by the chairman of the committee to bear the name by implication if not by merit, of a star-chamber tribunal. How such a tribunal may be advantageous to the service I, not being an expert, cannot of course determine with confidence; but considering the ordinary principles of human nature, it appears objectionable, because it places these military men at the mercy of the arbitrary judgment of their fellows, and tends to create a spirit of rivalry and contention which must prove a source of discord that will have a fatal influence upon the whole organization, rank and file. Upon this point I trust that when the section comes up we shall hear from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs an explanation which will be satisfactory to the House and to the Army, the officers of which, so far as my observation has gone, deem this feature of the bill very objectionable.

One object which I had in rising to speak on this occasion was to call attention to the fact that, until this bill shall be fully and fairly before the country, there can be no sufficient opportunity for members, particularly those on this side of the House, to gain practical and useful information as to the bearings of the bill upon the Army and its officers. I trust that the chairman of the committee will consent that this full and fair opportunity for becoming acquainted with the merits of the bill shall be given, and that final action upon it will be sufficiently delayed to enable us to inform ourselves properly. The chairman of the committee, by reason of his peculiar position, has, of course, opportunities of information superior to those possessed by most of the other members of the House, particularly the members of the Opposition. As one of these, who, according to the system carried out by the dominant party, are allowed to see the gates, but never to enter the portals of the political paradise, I ask for a little time, and express the hope that the discussion will be full and satisfactory. It is my impression that before the debate shall close the able and experienced chairman of the Military Committee will himself acknowledge that his bill is capable of improvement.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service there shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, all the first and second lieutenants of which, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service: Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointments as second lieutenants. Any portion of the cavalry force herein authorized may be dismounted and armed and drilled as infantry at the discretion of the President. Each cavalry regiment shall hereafter have but one hospital steward, and the regimental adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries shall hereafter be extra first lieutenants.

Mr. PAINE. I move the following amendment:

In the fifth line, after the word "which," insert the words "commissioned before the 1st day of January, 1870;" and in the sixth line, after the word "lieutenant," insert the same words: so that the clause will read as follows:

That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, all the first and second lieutenants of which, commissioned before the 1st day of January, 1870, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, commissioned before the 1st day of January, 1870, shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers, &c.

Mr. Speaker, this section provides that, in officer these six cavalry regiments, the first and second lieutenants shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers, and two thirds of the officers of the higher grades shall be selected in the same way. Now, the question at once presents itself, does this language mean that all the officers of these lower grades and two thirds of the officers of the higher grades shall for all time to come be selected from the volunteers; or does it mean that only the first appointments shall be made in that way from the volunteers?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the first is the purpose of the committee, it seems to me manifest injustice is done to the regular Army, and if the second is the meaning of the committee, it seems to me injustice is done to the officers of the volunteers. I believe it should be, as I have no doubt it is, the wish of the committee, to do equal and exact justice between them both. I certainly am disposed, and shall be hereafter, to cast my vote actuated alone by that principle. I wish to do everything that shall seem to be just and right in favor of the officers of the regular Army, while I shall at the same time insist upon everything which seems to me to be just and right to the officers of volunteers.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Wisconsin yields to me for a moment. I move that the evening session for this evening be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SATURDAY SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. STEVENS. While I am up I will make another suggestion. I do not know whether the House is disposed to sit to-morrow, as it is the anniversary of a striking event, the assassination of the late President. If not I will move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there are some six or eight gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. STEVENS. To-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Whenever they can get the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not move to adjourn over then, but move that to-morrow's session be exclusively devoted to debate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. PAINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be injustice to the officers of the regular Army if the appointments for all time to come, without further legislation, shall be given to officers of volunteers. On the other hand, it will not satisfy me if only the first appointments shall be given to volunteers. It is still less satisfactory to me that the law should stand ambiguous and open to such construction as the War Department or any officer called to consider it may choose to give. I have, therefore, offered what seems to me to be a compromise between those two plans, giving these appointments up to January 1, 1870, to officers of volunteers, leaving them after that time to be filled by the War Department as the Department may desire. I hope the gentleman will accept that.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me ask for a definition of the word "volunteers" as used in this bill. Do I understand it to embrace drafted men?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir. I have never heard it questioned.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin has discovered an ambiguity in this third section, which with him I am willing should be amended. He is right in supposing the understanding and intention, and such would only be the fair construction of the section, is to provide for volunteers who are to be appointed in the first appointments which are made, what is called the filling of original vacancies in these regiments. To remove the ambiguity it may be well to insert some provision to say it is only in these original vacancies created by calling into being these regiments or else to limit them to time, as he proposes.

I do not know I should object to the extension of the time, for that virtually is the effect of his amendment, so as to give the exclusive right of appointment to two thirds of the appointments to volunteers for nearly four years more. That can be the only effect to extend the time so as to be more favorable to volunteers. As it removes ambiguity and makes the section clear, I shall not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to offer the following amendment;

Strike out these words:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy, who served as officers of volunteers, shall be eligible to appointment as other officers of volunteers.

I do not perceive, sir, why this distinction is made between graduates of the Military Academy and those not graduates of the Military Academy when both served as volunteer officers. It will be seen this would exclude graduates of the Military Academy, although they did not serve as officers in the regular Army. I should like to hear a good reason given, either by the chairman of the Military Committee or some one else, why a graduate of the Military Academy, who has served as a volunteer officer during the rebellion, is less fit to receive an appointment than if he had received no military education at all?

Mr. SCHENCK. That proviso was put there for the purpose of saving graduates of the Military Academy. If the gentleman will hear me I will explain. The preceding portion of the section provides that the first and second lieutenants shall be taken from among the volunteers, and that would cut out the young men who have just left West Point. Something is to be done with them. You could not put a single one of them into the cavalry unless there was a saving clause which would embrace that proportion of them whom you might desire to appoint into the cavalry. It was, therefore, thought proper by the Committee on Military Affairs not to cut off the graduates from West Point, but to provide that while these subaltern appointments were to be given to volunteers or volunteer officers, an exception should be made in favor of the young men coming from West Point. That exception, however, only extends to making second lieutenants of them. That limitation to the second lieutenantcies in such appointments is occasioned by a desire to prevent the taking of these young gentlemen, fresh from West Point, and making them captains and first lieutenants, while you give to volunteer officers only second lieutenantcies. Such has actually been the case; there are young gentlemen who only left West Point last year, who are now captains in the service. The object of the committee is to save the graduates of West Point, and give them the same benefits that volunteer officers enjoy so far as second lieutenantcies are concerned.

But there is another point. The gentleman says that a graduate of West Point may have served as a volunteer officer. Well, if he has served in that capacity, and is yet in the regular Army, he is not cut off by this provision; because he is something now in the regular Army. He is at least a second lieutenant, and he retains his place. But if he was a graduate of West Point, and not in the regular Army, he was then only a volunteer officer, and he has the same advantages as any other man in the volunteer service.

Mr. BOYER. Would not those be excluded who, although graduates of the Military Academy, had never served in the regular Army, but had served during the war in the volunteer force? If that be the intention of the gentleman, I think his bill accomplishes his object. If it be not, then he ought to modify his bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Perhaps the gentleman might possibly find a case of that kind.

Mr. BOYER. There are hundreds of cases of that kind.

Mr. SCHENCK. If a graduate of West Point immediately upon graduating has resigned and afterward gone into the volunteer service, and is only a volunteer officer, he might be thus cut off.

Mr. BOYER. That would exclude hundreds of the best officers who fought during the war.

Mr. BLAINE. There may be cases of that kind, and I suggest the use of language which would obviate the difficulty. It may be surplusage or tautology, but I suggest to the gentleman that he insert after the word "eligible" the words "on gradation." That will obviate the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOYER. I will accept that amendment as far as it goes, but I still insist on the addition of the other words, "Provided, that graduates of the United States Military Academy who served as officers of volunteers shall be eligible to appointments on the same footing as other officers of volunteers."

Mr. SCHENCK. If you limit it to those it will cut off all the new graduates. Some of these young gentlemen have served nowhere. They have come out as graduates since the war was over, and we wish to save their right to promotion.

Mr. BOYER. The phraseology suggested by the gentleman from Maine would save that class, but not the class that I intend to save by the amendment which I propose.

Mr. BLAINE. I have a suggestion to make which, I think, will cover the point so that gentlemen cannot quibble or cavil about it at all. I suggest the addition of a proviso that graduates of the United States Military Academy, after the passage of this act, shall be eligible to appointment.

Mr. BOYER. There will still be an ambiguity about it.

Mr. BLAINE. Not if you insert the words, "Provided that cadets of the United States Military Academy who shall graduate after the passage of this act," &c.

Mr. BOYER. It will still be liable to ambiguity. It would lead to the inference that none but those would be eligible to appointments.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has got hold of the spirit of the proviso, which I thought the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs explained very clearly. The proviso is entirely in the interest of the West Point graduates. It was put in there for their benefit exclusively.

Mr. BOYER. Yes; so that they might be appointed second lieutenants and nothing else.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman tell me when a West Point graduate was ever entitled to any appointment except that of second lieutenant? This provision simply conveys to them the same right as regards these six regiments that they have in other parts of the Army. The first part of the section would have confined the selection of all the officers of these six regiments, both line and staff, to volunteers. It was thought by the Committee on Military Affairs that it would be unfair to cut off from appointments in these regiments those graduating from West Point.

Mr. BOYER. I can understand how the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maine would save young men who have just graduated at the Military Academy at West Point, but it would not save those who graduated there years ago, and who have been officers in the volunteer service during the war. That class would still remain unprovided for.

Mr. BLAINE. They stand precisely on the same footing as other volunteer officers.

Mr. BOYER. Well, I propose to make the matter plain by inserting the words I have suggested.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is the one third unprovided for, from which all persons may be appointed, together with the advantage they gain under the bill from having been volunteer officers as well as graduates of the Military Academy at West Point. It does seem to me that the class of persons to which the gentleman refers is amply provided for under those two heads. The proviso, as it now stands, would apply to the young cadets just out of the Academy.

Mr. BOYER. I want to provide for those graduates of the Military Academy who were officers in the volunteer service. Many of our most valuable volunteer officers who fought during the rebellion were graduates of West Point, who had never served in the regular Army. But when the rebellion broke out, having been educated at the public expense, they thought it their duty to volunteer, and they did so. Some of them led regiments; others were captains, or occupied other subordinate positions. Why should they, simply because they were graduates of the West Point Academy, be excluded; and why should they not be placed on the same footing as other volunteer officers?

Mr. GARFIELD. They are, under my reading of this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly totally misapprehends the whole tenor of this section, or else I am exceedingly in the dark myself. Suppose this proviso were not here at all, what then would be the effect? Why, that all these subaltern appointments would be given to volunteers, including those who had graduated at West Point as well as others. If they had left the regular Army and were volunteers only, and had been volunteers during this war, they would not be disqualified.

Now, we want to have them all to have the benefit of this section; all those who, having been graduates of West Point, have left the regular Army, have resigned their places therein, and have served only as volunteers. And then we want to put in a saving clause for the benefit of some few who may hereafter graduate, who without such saving clause would be disqualified. That is the whole of it.

There was perhaps some justice in the criticism of the gentleman, as it applied to the saving clause, so far as these cadets were concerned, for it might be held to extend to other classes than those just graduated. I suggest, therefore, that it be amended so as to read, "that cadets of the United States Military Academy hereafter graduating shall be eligible," &c.

Mr. BOYER. I understood the gentleman to say a few moments ago, when explaining the general features of this measure, that one difference between this bill and the bill which passed the Senate was, that the latter bill put regular officers who had also served as volunteer officers upon the same footing with volunteer officers, while the object of this bill was to exclude that class of officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is an entirely different section, and is in entirely different language.

Mr. BOYER. Very well; then I will wait until that section is reached, and in the mean time accept the modification of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had non-concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other liquors in the Capitol building and grounds.

Also, that the Senate had indefinitely postponed House bill No. 458, granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell.

Also, that the Senate had passed House bill No. 219, for the relief of Catherine Mock, with an amendment, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youly;

An act (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, of Chenango county, State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Mrs. Isabella Fogg, in the State of Maine;

An act (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore;

An act (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins;

An act (H. R. No. 443) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth York;

An act (H. R. No. 444) granting a pension to Lewis W. Dietrich; and

An act (H. R. No. 446) for the relief of Nicholas Hibner, late private in the sixth regiment of the Missouri State militia.

Also, that the Senate had passed Senate bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 201) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 237) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens;

An act (S. No. 238) granting a pension to Mrs. Amarilla Cook;

An act (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner; and

An act (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the following act and joint resolutions; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 229) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) for the temporary relief of destitute people in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) protesting against pardons by foreign Governments of persons convicted of infamous offenses on condition of emigration to the United States.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the third section by inserting after the words "graduates of the United States Military Academy" the words "who shall graduate after the passage of this act;" so that it will read:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy, who shall graduate after the passage of this act, shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

Mr. BOYER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest the further amendment to add the words, "and to no higher grade."

Mr. BLAINE. I take it that is the existing law.

Mr. CONKLING. The criticism made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] is that by the clause, as it stands unamended, a graduate from West Point must have served in order to be considered in reference to appointment as second lieutenant. The proposition now is to leave the section as it is in that respect, except to provide that graduates coming from the Military Academy hereafter shall be eligible to such appointment.

Now, if I understand the point and apprehend the force of this language, the change will be to confine the section as it now is to those who may graduate hereafter, leaving the other question as much open as it is now. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the object may be accomplished by inserting after the word "eligible," in the proviso as it now stands, the words "without having served as volunteers;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible without having served as volunteers to appointment as second lieutenants.

Mr. BOYER. I think myself that would be much better.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that would meet the point on all sides, and leave it in much better shape than it is now.

Mr. BLAINE. I will accept that in lieu of my amendment, although I think it is mere surplusage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] for a moment while I indicate an amendment which I think should be made to this section. I understand the object of the committee by this section to be to give to officers and soldiers of volunteers during the late war all the commissions of first and second lieutenants, and two thirds of those of higher grade. Now, it seems to me that the language employed in this section does not accomplish that object. The section now reads—

All the first and second lieutenants of which, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, shall be elected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, &c.

Now, a great many of the officers of volunteers who served in the late war also held commissions in the regular Army.

Mr. BLAINE. That point is fully met by another section of this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to insert after the word "volunteers," in the clause I have just read, the words "not holding commissions in the regular Army."

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg to call the attention of the gentleman to section forty of this bill, which obviates all ambiguity such as the gentleman complains of. That section provides:

That officers of the regular Army, who have also held commissions as officers of volunteers, shall not on that account be held to be volunteers under the provisions of this act.

This defines what is meant by "officers of volunteers," so as to exclude any conclusion such as the gentleman thinks might be arrived at without such a provision.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that is true, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] in regard to the time during which this provision for the appointment of officers is to continue in force. I will state what I understand to be the effect of that amendment.

As the section now stands it has application only to the filling of the original vacancies—the formation of the regiment at the outset—leaving the laws already in force and as amended by this bill to apply with reference to subsequent promotions and appointments in each regiment. The result of that is that when the original vacancies are once filled there are no further appointments, except to the grade of second lieutenant. Now, the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin is simply to provide that for a term of nearly four years those original appointments to the grade of second lieutenant shall be made solely from volunteer officers and soldiers, thus excluding from promotion during all that time the rank and file of this very army which we are now organizing.

I submit that such a policy is one which this House is not ready, on deliberate consideration, to sanction, and one which ought not to be sanctioned. I submit that if we are ever to have an efficient army we must in organizing it rely mainly on the opportunity for promotion held out to the rank and file of that army. Hence, it appears to me that this provision proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin will derogate greatly from the efficiency of the army which we now propose to organize.

I trust that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that appointments to the grade of second lieutenant, after the regiments are once organized, after the original vacancies are once filled, will be left open, as they are under existing laws, to the rank and file, to those who have served as volunteers, to those who may come from civil life, and to the graduates of the Military Academy.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to say a few words in reply to the considerations submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] and I will admit at the outset that those considerations are not without weight. But the gentleman, while he is proposing to provide by law that these positions shall be given hereafter to men in the ranks, must also bear in mind that the larger proportion of these six regiments will be made up of men who have been volunteers during this war, and who will hence fall strictly within the terms of the section as now amended on my motion. I am anxious to provide for the volunteers who have served in this war and who may hereafter reenlist in the regular Army; but I contend that they are covered by the section as it now stands.

There is another thing which the gentleman must not overlook. He is anxious, as I am, to provide for the seventeen hundred officers of the regular Army; but, sir, I am anxious, as I believe he must be, to provide for the fifty or one hundred thousand officers of volunteers.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will permit me to say that it is the privates, the rank and file of the regular Army, not the officers, that I am now trying to provide for.

Mr. PAINE. I understand; but, as I was remarking, I am anxious that the fifty or one hundred thousand officers of the volunteer army should not be lost sight of. Let me say to the gentleman again, what he appears to have failed to understand, that the rank and file of these six new regiments will be men who have served in the volunteer army during this war, and those men are covered by the section as it stands with my amendment, for by that section these commissions are to be given, not to volunteer officers alone, as the gentleman seems to suppose, but to volunteer officers or soldiers.

I may remark, too, that, as I believe, a statutory provision ought hereafter to be adopted that promotions and commissions in the regular Army shall be given exclusively to officers and soldiers actually in the service, so that the privates may be lifted up by merit to commissions, as they deserve to be. But I cannot see the force of the gentleman's objection to my amendment already adopted.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will allow me to submit to him this single proposition, whether there is any justice, or fairness, or propriety in providing that a soldier who has served in the volunteer forces during the last four years and then enlisted in the regular Army, shall be eligible to appointment as a second lieutenant, while a private, a corporal, or a sergeant who has served faithfully in the regular Army during the same period shall be ineligible. The effect of the amendment is to make that discrimination.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, there is a single consideration I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin. One of the difficulties we are going to encounter is to fill the ranks of the Army which we are providing for in this bill. The officers are going to be numerous. It will be more than four times as large as any Army we have ever had in the United States. Now, the graduates of the West Point Military Academy will not begin to supply the commissions this Army will call for. Heretofore graduation at West Point has outrun the demand for officers to such an extent that a great many had to enter as brevet second lieutenants, who remained brevet second lieutenants for years. I know officers who served fifteen years before they got first lieutenant's commissions.

That being the case, the way to official position not being through West Point, except for a minority of places, if the Army bill is wisely regulated you can make the appointing power to official position one of the strongest stimulants of filling up your ranks. I would like to see it confined that the first appointments and promotion to official positions should be from West Point and from the rank and file. You can get a better class of men. You will prevent, too, what is called political influence in making appointments. You certainly will stimulate enlistments. Deserving men who enter the Army and get the rank of corporals or sergeants will have a fair show of being officers in a few years.

Mr. THAYER. How does the gentleman propose to stimulate enlistment by providing that those who enlist shall not be promoted until 1870?

Mr. BLAINE. As I am speaking against that amendment the gentleman had better ask the question of some one else. I am speaking against the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I am for filling up with officers of volunteers at the organization and then leaving promotion open to the rank and file. Therefore I am for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALE. I will state, if this be reconsidered, it will be perfectly satisfactory to retain the present words moved by the gentleman from Wisconsin; and simply to add to them that they shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers and the enlisted men of the regular Army.

Mr. PAINE. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. HALE. That will provide that these vacancies shall be filled either from the volunteer or regular Army. If it be satisfactory, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider, and move to add after the word "service" in the tenth line, "or enlisted men of the regular Army;" so that it will read, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service there shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, all the first and second lieutenants of which, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service, or enlisted men of the regular Army.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to that amendment. The officers and soldiers of the regular Army have, under this section as it now stands, avenues for promotion open to them in all the old regiments of which they are members, as well as to one third of the officers of the new regiments. These regiments are going to be filled up, if at all, by men who served in the late war almost entirely. This section provides that the officers and soldiers who served in the late war may hold all the offices except one third. What is the use of extending it to embrace soldiers of the regular Army who already may receive commissions in the old regiments? Now, sir, these new regiments are to be filled up by soldiers of the late war. I say they are all included in this section without amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will extend the privilege to all the men in the old regiments now.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will allow me to explain. He misapprehends my amendment. It is simply that the original vacancies—that is what I intend by it, but perhaps I failed to express it clearly—that the original vacancies above that of first lieutenant are to be filled by promotion and not by appointment, and the rank of second lieutenant is to be filled from those who served in the volunteers during this war or served in the regular Army.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is not in the amendment as proposed by the gentleman before. That is very well.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman's criticism is just. I will so modify my amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I supposed the amendment of the gentleman from New York was to be inserted in line seven. That presented itself to my mind at first. Now, he proposes something different by placing the amendment in the tenth line, which gives a man who happened to be an enlisted man in the regular Army the same rights and privileges as those who rendered actual service during the war. It is not just.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not regard the gentleman as accepting the amendment, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] withdrew his motion to reconsider, and moved to amend the section by adding thereto.

Mr. PAINE. I have made my objections to the amendment. I have said what I wish, and that I cannot accept it.

Mr. HALE. Being satisfied that the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] in regard to my original amendment was well founded, and that it failed to express the idea I had intended, I will modify it thus:

After the word "service" insert as follows:
And after the original vacancies are filled, enlisted men of the regular Army shall in like manner be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am afraid this will not cohere very well, and that it will not accomplish the object which the gentleman has in view.

I yielded to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to remove some of the ambiguity in the section upon the question whether these were the original vacancies or not. But I doubt the propriety of extending it further than three or four years to come. I think the intention of the committee in the original section was about right, and that may be carried out if the gentleman will reconsider his proposition and insert something of the kind in another place. I will suggest that section three be amended so as to read thus:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service there shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, and in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the regiments thus provided for all the first and second lieutenants, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service.

I think that will compromise all these differences. I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] whether that will not accomplish the object.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to ask, does this proposition include the reconsideration of the amendment passed on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE?]

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAINE. The proposition of the chairman of the committee is not satisfactory to me for the reasons that I gave at the outset. It seems to me that something more than the original vacancies should be retained to reward those men who have served in the volunteer army during the war. There have been from one to two millions of them, and from fifty to a hundred thousand officers who have served in the volunteers, and if we give to them only the specified original vacancies in these six new regiments of cavalry, leaving all the other six and a part of these to officers and privates of the regular Army, it seems to me we shall not be doing justice to officers and soldiers of the volunteers. As it stands now the regular Army has the commissions of six of the cavalry regiments and one third of all above lieutenants in the others. Why should we give to the few men who compose the regular Army, either as officers or as enlisted men, not only the commissions of the six old regiments and one third of those of the higher grades of the new, but also the greater part of the remaining two thirds of the commissions of the six new regiments of cavalry? I would be willing to abridge the time, but I cannot consent that all the promotions to be made after the original vacancies shall be filled shall pass beyond the reach of the volunteer officers.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I believe the regular Army has always taken care to look out for its own children in regard to promotion. No one has ever been promoted over the great bulk of the cadets.

Mr. BLAINE. The Army Register shows some one hundred and fifty officers who have been promoted directly from the ranks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. A large number of promotions have been made lately from the regular Army from sergeants to first lieutenants and captains to make room for first and second lieutenants on the recommendation of members of Congress. But I have not seen any first lieutenants or captains appointed upon such recommendation. I see a great many colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors who have served faithfully during the war have been appointed second lieutenants while sergeants have been promoted to make room for them.

Mr. SCHENCK. To bring the House back to the suggestion that I made as a compromise, I propose to insert in section three after the words "cavalry regiments," these words:

And in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the regiments thus provided for, and for a period of three years after the passage of this act.

Also to strike out the words "of which;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service there shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, and in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the regiments thus provided for, and for a period of three years after the passage of this act, all the first and second lieutenants, and two thirds of the officers in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service.

The motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. PAINE was adopted was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the said amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw it, and accept the proposition of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was then agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask now to have read the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. I will modify it by inserting after the word "lieutenant" these words:

And that after the original vacancies are filled, enlisted men of the regular Army shall in like manner be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is not necessary now, after the adoption of the last amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the amendment in the shape now presented will not prevail, and for this reason: if it be passed, all that a civilian who has ever served in his life has to do to get into the regular Army as second lieutenant is to have it arranged that as soon as he shall be enlisted in the regular Army he shall be promoted, and in a few days he can pass from civil life to the position of a commissioned officer. Now, that is precisely the thing which we do not want to be done. We want the Army to be made up of those who have served either in the ranks or as officers.

It has been said, very properly, that persons who have served in the regular Army ought to have a chance to be promoted. They have a chance now every day. In the nineteen regiments now in service it is a very common thing for enlisted men to be promoted to commissions. Therefore no wrong is done to these by the law as it now stands. But if we do what the amendment proposes, men who never saw a day's service can enlist to-day and to-morrow get commissions as second lieutenants.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to bring to the attention of the House a single instance that occurred within my personal knowledge. A man of influence had a friend for whom he desired a commission in the regular Army. He enlisted and received a high bounty from the Government, with an arrangement by which he was placed immediately on agreeable duty at the headquarters of his immediate commander, and as soon as possible recommended for promotion. And but a short time elapsed after he had pocketed his bounty and entered the regiment as a private, before he received his commission, for which alone he enlisted.

That will be done every day if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HALE. It will probably be difficult to frame any bill that will not be subject to abuses by the President of the United States, the Senate of the United States, the Secretary of War, and officers in command of brigades and regiments in the Army. It can hardly be expected that we can provide against all the frauds which may be committed by the collusion of all those officers. But for the sake of obviating the difficulty to which the gentleman refers I have no objection to again modify my amendment by saying "enlisted men of the regular Army who shall have served at least one year."

Mr. GARFIELD. During the late war.

Mr. HALE. I insist that it should not be "during the late war." We should leave the door open to meritorious service hereafter as it has been heretofore. Gentlemen familiar with the history of the Army know that there have been as gallant and meritorious deeds performed by our soldiers of the rank and file at obscure points on our frontiers, in Indian wars, as have been performed in this war against the rebellion. Now, I am unwilling to shut the door against men who may wish to enlist in the Army and earn their commissions as heretofore.

I will modify my amendment by inserting the words "after six months."

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. HALE as modified.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DEMING. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] will withdraw that motion for a few moments.

Mr. DEMING. I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to insert after the words "shall be eligible" the words "without having served as volunteers."

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE], to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WRIGHT] has indicated his purpose to move an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it not be in order for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to submit his motion to reconsider on next Monday, the next legislative day?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman that he can accomplish his purpose by entering the motion to reconsider to be acted on hereafter.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will do that.

The motion to reconsider was accordingly entered upon the Journal.

By unanimous consent the House postponed informally the further consideration of the Army bill, and proceeded to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

MRS. ANN HETH.

The first business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 201) for the relief of Mrs. Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. MARTHA STEVENS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 237) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. AMARILLA COOK.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 238) granting a pension to Mrs. Amarilla Cook; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. AGNES W. LAUGHLIN.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. SARAH E. WILSON.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. EMERANCE GOULER.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AMERICAN FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, requesting information in regard to the rights and interests of American citizens in the fishing grounds adjacent to the British Provinces, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, April 13, 1866.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOYER asked, and obtained, leave of absence for ten days for his colleague, Mr. DENISON.

And then, on motion of Mr. DEMING, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

Also, the petition of Alonzo Gaston, and 239 others, wool-growers of Lorain county, Ohio, asking protection on wool.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Henry Wilder, and others, trustees of Lancaster Savings Bank, in the ninth Massachusetts district, for a repeal of the tax on deposits in said institutions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

Rev. C. B. BORTON, Chaplain of the House, offered the following prayer:

O God! we come before Thee to-day, impressed with a vivid consciousness that we are frail, corrupt, and passing away. Often reminded of the uncertainty of our lives, to-day we have brought before us anew him whom we may justly call the nation's dead, and with whom the dead of the Senate and the dead of this House are thus made to address us again from their graves. O Lord, help us to heed this solemn admonition. The business of life has so frequently of late been interrupted by the solemn memorials and admonitions of death that we should be very unwise if we failed to lay them to heart. And now we pray Thee, O God, that we may profit by these solemn lessons which are brought anew to us here this morning. May we remember how quickly our own lives may and will pass. We cannot tell how many of us ere another year shall roll around will also be called to our account. As those who have been called away have been associated with us in all the concerns of this present life, so we ere long must join them, and be associated with them in all the untried scenes of that eternal world. So may we, O God, number our days here as to apply our hearts unto wisdom, and be prepared to render up our account, as they also have done.

We beseech Thee, O God, that while the nation is reminded of the life as well as the death of our departed Chief, the people may learn to love better than ever the principles which he professed and in defense of which he died. Great God, may all the actions of the different departments of the Government converge upon the great object upon which Thy providences also unite—the establishment here of one free and Christian nation, where man shall be recognized as man because he bears the image of his Maker, and where God shall be universally acknowledged. We ask and offer all in Jesus' name, to whom be glory forever. Amen.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that this House do now adjourn. And before the vote upon that motion is taken I desire to say a few words.

This day, Mr. Speaker, will be sadly memorable so long as this nation shall endure, which God grant may be "till the last syllable of recorded time," when the volume of human history shall be scaled up and delivered to the omnipotent Judge.

In all future time, on the recurrence of this day, I doubt not that the citizens of this Republic will meet in solemn assembly to reflect on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln, and the awful tragic event of April 14, 1865—an event unparalleled in the history of nations, certainly unparalleled in our own. It is eminently proper that this House should this day place upon its records a memorial of that event.

The last five years have been marked by wonderful developments of individual character. Thousands of our people before unknown to fame have taken their places in history, crowned with immortal honors. In thousands of humble homes are dwelling heroes and patriots whose names shall never die.

But greatest among all these great developments were the character and fame of Abraham Lincoln, whose loss the nation still deplores. His character is aptly described in the words of England's great laureate—written thirty years ago—in which he traces the upward steps of some—

"Divinely gifted man,
Whose life in low estate began,
And on a simple village green;"

"Who breaks his birth's invidious bar,
And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
And breasts the blows of circumstance,
And grapples with his evil star;

"Who makes by force his merit known,
And lives to clutch the golden keys
To mold a mighty State's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the throne;

"And moving up from high to higher,
Becomes on Fortune's crowning slope,
The pillar of a people's hope,
The center of a world's desire."

Such a life and character will be treasured forever as the sacred possession of the American people and of mankind. In the great drama of the rebellion there were two acts. The first was the war with its battles and sieges, victories and defeats, its sufferings and tears.

That act was closing one year ago to-night, and just as the curtain was lifting on the second and final act, the restoration of peace and liberty; just as the curtain was rising upon new characters and new events, the evil spirit of the rebellion, in the fury of despair, nerved and directed the hand of the assassin to strike down the chief character in both.

It was no one man who killed Abraham Lincoln; it was the embodied spirit of treason and slavery, inspired with fearful and despairing hate, that struck him down in the moment of the nation's supremest joy.

Ah! sir, there are times in the history of men and nations when they stand so near the veil that separates mortals from the immortals, time from eternity, and men from their God, that they can almost hear the beatings and feel the pulsations of the heart of the Infinite. Through such a time has this nation passed. When two hundred and fifty thousand brave spirits passed from the field of honor through that thin veil to the presence of God, and when at last its parting folds admitted the martyr President to the company of the dead heroes of the Republic, the nation stood so near the veil that the whispers of God were heard by the children of men.

Awe-stricken by His voice, the American people knelt in tearful reverence and made a solemn covenant with Him and with each other that this nation should be saved from its enemies, that all its glories should be restored, and on the ruins of slavery and treason the temples of freedom and justice should be built and should survive forever. It remains for us, consecrated by that great event, and under a covenant with God, to keep that faith, to go forward in the great work until it shall be completed.

Following the lead of that great man and obeying the high behests of God, let us remember that—"He has sounded forth a trumpet that shall never call retreat;

He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat.
Be swift my soul to answer him, be jubilant my feet;
For God is marching on."

I move, sir, that this House do now adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of John S. Strong, and 32 others, of Lenawee county, Michigan; also, the petition of James C. Watson, and 31 others, of Ann Arbor, Michigan; also, the petition of Professor E. Durand, and 32 others, of Chelsea, Washtenaw county, Michigan; also, the petition of John H. Burleson, and 12 others, of Ann Arbor, Michigan; also, the petition of B. C. Benson, and 35 others, of Jonesville, Michigan; also, the petition of William Burt, and 45 others, of Detroit, Michigan; also, the petition of Hiram Walker, and 32 others, of Detroit; also, the petition of L. Black & Co., and 61 others, of Detroit; also, the petition of A. Shelley, and 112 others, of Detroit; also, the petition of R. Verner, and 21 others, of Detroit; also, the petition of John L. Whiting, and 33 others, of Detroit, Michigan; all praying Congress to enact such just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds as may be effectual in establishing the greatest security for the interests protected by policies and promotive of the greatest good and convenience to all concerned in such transactions.

Also, the petition of Ethel Judd, and 51 others, inhabitants of Hillsdale county, Michigan, praying for increase of duty on all unwashed foreign wool.

By Mr. DELANO: The petition of D. G. Weyth, and 100 others, citizens and wool-growers, of Licking county, Ohio, praying an increased duty on foreign wools for the benefit of wool-growers of this country.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 16, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of Friday last.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is hardly necessary to read this record of pension bills; it is very long indeed; and I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal. If there be no objection, it will be considered the sense of the Senate that the further reading be dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present the memorial of the Oregon City Manufacturing Company, in which it is represented that that company is now engaged in the manufacture of woollen cloths, and is also engaged in the manufacture of ready-made clothing in its own mills out of the cloths of its own production, and it further represents that, by a decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the company is made liable to pay a tax, first, on the value of the cloth manufactured, and then upon the entire value of the ready-made clothing; and the memorial prays that the revenue law may be so modified that after the payment of the tax upon the value of the cloth, the company may be relieved from the payment of any tax except upon the increased value made by converting the cloth into clothing, as is the case in reference to fabrics made out of cotton cloths. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of Henry Miller and others, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, engaged in the manufacture of malt liquors, praying for a reduction of duties on foreign barley imported into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial of Lieutenant Commander R. L. Law, praying to be restored to active duty in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a communication addressed to him, from James F. Miller, of Peru, Indiana, representing that frauds have been perpetrated upon the Miami Indians of Indiana, growing out of a misapplication of the funds granted them by the treaty of June 5, 1854, and praying for an investigation of the matter; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of members of the bar of Washington county, Pennsylvania, and also a memorial of members of the bar of Venango county, Pennsylvania, praying that the salaries of the judges of the United States district courts may be increased; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Alexander Young, John Gibson, and others, distillers and dealers in domestic spirits in the city of Philadelphia, in which they represent that the exaction of personal security for the payment of duties on spirits deposited in general bonded warehouses is in effect a heavy tax on trade without any advantage to the revenue, and praying for a modification of the law so that they may be relieved from its payment; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of wool growers, residing in Crawford county, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of the duty on the importations of foreign wool into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of New York, asking for the passage of an act of Congress appropriating the sum of $877,628 to pay the claims of the seventeen thousand two hundred and twenty-eight persons which have been audited and found due for clothing and other contingent expenses of the militia of the State of New York who served in the war of 1812, which clothing and other expenses were necessary and unavoidable in consequence of the inadequate compensation of eight dollars a month, without bounty or an allowance for clothing, provided by the act of Congress authorizing the President to call out the militia, by draft or otherwise, for a period not exceeding six months. They have also instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to vote for the passage of such an act. I move that the resolutions be printed, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a communication addressed to him, from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriations required for fulfilling treaty stipulations with certain bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians, under treaties ratified by the Senate since the 1st of December last; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heernance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) appointing a board of managers for the National Military Asylum, reported it adversely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield S. Hancock, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 262) to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia and organizing an active volunteer militia force throughout the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 472) for the relief of George R. Frank, late captain thirty-third regiment Wisconsin volunteer infantry, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Duncan G. MacRae, praying for compensation for services rendered in carrying the mail in North Carolina, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

AMERICAN REGISTERS TO VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 30) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan and Dispatch and W. K. Muir, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 266) to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 64) for the appointment of a commission to consist of engineers of the Army upon the subject of the construction of railroad bridges across the Mississippi river; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 65) for the discontinuance of New Orleans branch mint, and for the appropriation of the machinery thereof to the construction of the branch mint in Nevada; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 267) authorizing the establishment of a navy-yard and a coal and naval depot at the harbor of Annapolis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 13th instant, the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 199) to establish the collection district of Port Huron, the collection district of Michigan, the collection district of Montana and Idaho, and to change the name of the collection district of Penobscot;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 44) authorizing Commodore William Radford to accept a decoration from the King of Italy;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 53) authorizing Rear Admiral H. Paulding to accept a decoration from the King of Italy; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 58) respecting the burial of soldiers who died in the military service of the United States during the rebellion.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. On Friday last, under the instruction of the Committee on Public Lands, I reported to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, with amendments. Upon examining it since it has been printed I find that it will become necessary to refer it back to the Committee on Public Lands, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire whether the full Army Register now in course of publication has been compiled in accordance with the requirement of the joint resolution approved March 2, 1865, and what will be the cost of such publication.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to this resolution. This roster was printed in pursuance of the joint resolution approved March 2, 1865, which directed the publication of "a full roster or roll of all general, field, line, and staff officers of volunteers who have been in the Army of the United States at any time since the beginning of the present rebellion, including all informal organizations which have been recognized or accepted and paid by the United States;" and the resolution also goes on to say:

And, to defray in whole or in part the expenses of this publication, an edition of twenty-five thousand copies of such enlarged Register shall be published, and may be sold to officers, soldiers, or citizens, at a price which shall not more than cover the actual cost of paper, printing, and binding; and shall not, in any case, exceed one dollar per volume.

I suppose it was the idea of the Senate when this resolution was passed that the roster could be printed in about one volume, but I find that it will take eight volumes, and to print an edition of twenty-five thousand copies of eight volumes will cost $200,000. I should think the probability of the Government being reimbursed by the sale of those copies of any considerable portion of the expense of publication is very doubtful indeed.

But that is not all. This resolution requires that the roster shall include "all informal organizations which have been recognized or accepted and paid by the United States." Now, I find in looking over this Register, that the first New Hampshire regiment, under Colonel Tappan, is not named; the sixth Massachusetts regiment, which marched through Baltimore and drew the first blood of the rebellion, is not mentioned; and the eighth Massachusetts regiment, which opened the road from Annapolis, is not mentioned. Both those regiments received the thanks of Congress; and yet in this roster, which was to include not only all the regiments in the service, but all the informal organizations, those regiments are not even named. I find also that the first Rhode Island regiment, which came by the way of Annapolis to the relief of Washington, with my colleague, then Governor of Rhode Island, at the head of it, under the command of Colonel Burnside, afterward a major general, and now Governor-elect of Rhode Island, is not mentioned. I find also that the first, second, and third Connecticut regiments are not named. I do not think Congress would be willing to expend $200,000 to print that sort of a roster. I do not know that this can be prevented; but with regard to many regiments, instead of giving the official list of the battles in which the regiments bore an honorable part, I find this record:

"The official list of battles in which this regiment bore an honorable part is not yet published in orders."

I find that this paragraph applies to a third of the regiments. I think it is time that those were made known, if they are ever to be made known. I do not know but that the delay is unavoidable, but until those battles can be ascertained and placed at the head of each regiment, I think this publication had better be postponed.

This is a subject that belongs properly to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I hope they will give it their attention.

I wish to say further, that I think the publication of this document is needlessly expensive. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will find upon reading it over that there are a great number of blank pages in it.

The Superintendent of Public Printing submitted to me what I considered a much better form, and which would be much cheaper and much more convenient, but it did not seem to meet the approbation of those who are engaged upon the work. I would not undertake to decide between the two. I think the Committee on Military Affairs had better examine into the subject.

The resolution was adopted.

CLAIM OF GEORGE M'DOUGALL.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report on the claim of George McDougall, heretofore referred to the Secretary of the Interior by a resolution of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state, in explanation of the resolution, that it refers to a claim connected with Indian affairs in California. It was formerly referred by a resolution of the Senate, for report, to the Interior Department when that Department was presided over by Secretary Smith. No report was ever made; and the present Secretary desires that a new call may be made upon him, if he is to be called upon to report upon it. The object is to get a report in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs for examination. The claimant is now deceased, and the proceedings to be taken are in behalf of his widow.

The resolution was adopted.

SIOUX CITY BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill No. 109.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 109) to rescind the order of the President designating the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct the branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City.

As the President of the United States, on the 24th of December, 1864, designated the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Iowa, for the purpose of constructing and operating the branch of the Union Pacific railroad, authorized to be constructed by the seventeenth section of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," &c.; and as that company has filed a map in the Department of the Interior of the route over which it proposes to construct the branch road; and as the construction of the branch road upon the route proposed will be in violation of the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress, the bill proposes to amend the order of the President designating the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to be the company authorized to build the branch railroad, under and in pursuance of the seventeenth section of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean."

Mr. HOWARD. This bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad several weeks since. The object of it is to set aside an order made by President Lincoln, dated the 24th of December, 1864, giving to the Sioux City Railroad Company the right to construct what is known as the Sioux City branch of the Pacific railroad. The order to which I refer is found in Document No. 14 of the Executive Documents of the present session. It is as follows:

Whereas the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, a company organized under the laws of Iowa, has requested the President of the United States to designate said company "for the purpose of constructing and operating a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City to such point on, and so as to connect with, the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as such company may select":

Therefore be it known, That by the authority conferred upon the President of the United States by the seventeenth section of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," &c., I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby designate the said Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company for the purpose above mentioned.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

December 24, 1864.

That order, it will be observed, was dated the 24th of December, 1864. By the fourteenth section of the Pacific railroad act of 1862, the Union Pacific Railroad Company was bound to construct a branch from Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to a point on the Iowa branch or on the Pacific railroad, not further west than the one hundredth degree of longitude. It will be seen that this clause of the act of 1862 made it obligatory upon the Pacific Railroad Company to construct this Sioux City branch; but by the act of 1864, amendatory of the Pacific railroad act of 1862, the Union Pacific Railroad Company was relieved of the obligation to build it; and the amendatory act provided as follows:

"That whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through the State of Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City, such company, now organized or as may hereafter be organized under the laws of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, or Nebraska, as the President of the United States, by its request, may designate or approve for that purpose, shall construct and operate a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to such a point on, and so as to connect with, the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as such company may select, and on the same terms and conditions as are provided in this act and the act to which this is an amendment, for the construction of the said Union and Pacific railroad and telegraph line and branches; and said company shall complete the same at the rate of fifty miles per year."

Such was the amendatory act of 1864, but the amendatory act also adopted the principle of not allowing the Government bonds to issue on account of the road beyond the one hundredth degree of longitude. The company might extend its road further west, but it would not be entitled to the aid of bonds, but only of alternate sections of land on each side of it. That was the effect of the amendatory act of 1864 compared with the original act. The language of the amendatory act—I refer to the seventeenth section of that act, which I might, perhaps, as well read—is as follows:

"SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That so much of section fourteen of said act as relates to a branch from Sioux City be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: that whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through the State of Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City, such company, now organized, or as may hereafter be organized under the laws of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, or Nebraska, as the President of the United States, by its request, may designate or approve for that purpose, shall construct and operate a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to such a point on, and so as to connect with the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as such company may select, and on the same terms and conditions as are provided in this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, for the construction of the said Union and Pacific railroad and telegraph line and branches, and said company shall complete the same at the rate of fifty miles per year: Provided, That said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall be, and is hereby, released from the construction of said branch. And said company constructing said branch shall not be entitled to receive in bonds an amount larger than the said Union Pacific Railroad Company would be entitled to receive if it had constructed the branch under this act and the act to which this is an amendment; but said company shall be entitled to receive alternate sections of land for ten miles in width on each side of the same along the whole length of said branch: And provided further, That if a railroad should not be completed to Sioux City, across Iowa or Minnesota, within eighteen months from the date of this act, then said company designated by the President, as aforesaid, may commence, continue, and complete the construction of said branch as contemplated by the provisions of this act."

It was under that section that President Lincoln made the order designating the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company as the corporation to construct the Sioux City branch. According to the construction which I put upon the seventeenth section of the act of 1864, it was incompetent for the President to make an order designating any company for the construction of the Sioux City branch within the eighteen months which were allowed by this seventeenth section. Nor was it competent for him, as I understand the act, to designate any company for the construction of that branch until there should be a railroad running through either the State of Iowa or the State of Minnesota to Sioux City. The object of the Government was plain, to secure the construction of some railroad through Minnesota or Iowa to Sioux City, so as to form a connection at that point with the railroad system extending through Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, the purpose being, according to my view of the statute and the policy of Congress at that time, to establish Sioux City as a kind of central point at which the railroad system of the northwestern States should form a connection with the Pacific railroad proper. Nevertheless, upon the application of certain gentlemen connected with the Sioux City Railroad Company, the President was induced to make what I regard as a premature order in the premises, giving this privilege to the Sioux City railroad at a period so early after the passage of the act as to cut off all fair and just competition between that company and other companies for the construction of this road.

It will be observed also that the very language of the seventeenth section, from which I have read, requires this route, whatever company may attempt to construct the road upon it, to be on the most direct and practicable line. The words are, "on the most direct and practicable route from Sioux City," to form a connection either with the Iowa branch, the Omaha branch, so called, of the Pacific railroad, or with the Pacific railroad proper itself, in which latter case the junction would have been at, or west of, the one hundredth degree of west longitude.

The Sioux City company seem to have been on the alert, and as early as June, 1865, about six months after President Lincoln's order was issued, they filed a map of the route which they propose to follow through Sioux City westward to form the junction upon the Iowa or Omaha branch, with the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. I hold in my hand the map which was furnished the committee by the Secretary of the Interior. The company in laying down the route of their road commence at Sioux City on the Missouri river. Instead of proceeding to the west, however, they proceed to the southeast. They run a distance of about twenty miles nearly southeast in the State of Iowa. After reaching the most eastern point of their route, they proceed to the south, and then to the southwest, crossing the Missouri river, run thence almost in a southwesterly direction, and terminate at the little village of Frémont, in Nebraska Territory, between the Platte river and the head waters of the Elkhorn river, a distance in the whole of at least ninety-five miles, forming a sort of ox-bow; proceeding first to the southeast, then to the south, and then to the southwest; and at Frémont they form a connection with the Omaha branch of the Pacific railroad. When they have reached Frémont, they have made a westing from the point at which they started, that is Sioux City, of not quite five miles; and the traveler and his freight, in proceeding from Sioux City to the Omaha branch, has been obliged to go at least ninety-five miles in order to proceed westward five miles. This circuitous route makes twenty miles of easting into Iowa, seventy-two miles of southing, and has a length from Sioux City to Frémont of at least ninety-five miles, as I have already remarked, and in running this distance they get west of Sioux City only five miles; that is, they run ninety-five miles in order to get forward five miles!

There is another view of this subject, Mr. President, which ought not to be omitted. The Government, by the terms of the amended Pacific railroad act of 1864, lends its credit to the company, to the amount of $16,000 for each mile, amounting for the whole of this distance, calling the distance ninety-five miles—and it is certainly, I think, greater than that—to $1,520,000. Besides this, the company is to get the land subsidy along the whole of this ox-bow line of ninety-five miles at the rate of twenty sections per mile, amounting in all to nine hundred and fifty sections of land, or six hundred and eight thousand acres, worth at the minimum price $760,000.

The committee, after looking this whole subject over and discussing it at several meetings, and after hearing men of experience acquainted with that part of the country, who made their statements on the subject, came to the conclusion that the better way was to set aside the President's order of the 24th of December, 1864, and open this subject for competition between any companies that may see fit to compete for it. Of course, it does not belong to me to pass any censure upon the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company for adopting this course, but I cannot omit to say that I regard their conduct in selecting this circuitous route through Iowa, thus increasing the distance for persons connected with the northwestern railroads and northwestern transportation very considerably, as a plain departure from the manifest intent and meaning of the law of 1864. What the northwestern States want particularly is as direct intercommunication with the Pacific railroad as is practicable; and they do not wish to be compelled, in traveling, or in the transportation of their freight and merchandise, to pass over a hundred miles distance upon a railroad which is entirely unnecessary so far as they are concerned; thus greatly increasing the expense of travel and transportation. The object of the bill is to set aside that order and open the whole subject for competition hereafter between the companies that may see fit to compete for the construction of this branch.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is my impression that I was chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee when Sioux City was made to have a connection with the Pacific railroad. I can say, as all who were then members of the Senate know, that Kansas and Iowa quarreled much. I was industrious (at least I thought I was industrious) to secure a communication from the valley of the Mississippi to my own coast, and not very particular about how it was done so that it was well done. The line from Sioux City was made a line of communication, but not as a main line. A branch was fought for by the extreme Northwest from St. Paul downward. I am not unacquainted with the topography and geography of that part of the world; perhaps I am quite as familiar with it as the Senator from Michigan; perhaps a little more so; for I do not think he ever rode horses in that part of our land. It is only a line of communication to bring Minnesota and the extreme Northwest down into communication with the main line, so as to bring the main trunk at the one hundredth meridian in communication with the point stated in the bill. It never was intended as a direct line, but, upon a topographical investigation, a route from Sioux City to the one hundredth meridian was regarded as the best means to unite the main route with the northwestern railroad system. I think I have pursued the study of the possibilities of railroad lines between the Mississippi valley and my own coast with as much carefulness, I dare say with more carefulness, than any man I know.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know that I understand the Senator from California very clearly; but if I do, I understand him to say that there has been some topographical report on the subject of this branch line. I have never seen any such report.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I had, when I first came into the House of Representatives, fifty manuscript maps of that part of the country, besides the surveys of the engineers of the Government—fifty that I had employed men to make—and then I understood the country myself by my own personal cognition. I say that this branch was provided for simply to connect the Northwest, from Lake Superior down through Minnesota, and join it to the main line communicating with California. That proposition, when presented from the Northwest, met with my full approbation, I having carefully studied the subject. I think the Senator from Michigan, who is always careful, and to whose opinions I always listen with great respect, is a little mistaken, because he has not gone quite far enough west.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Michigan is much more familiar with the statutes of the United States on the subject of the Pacific railroad than I am, but I must claim that I am a little more familiar with the topography of the country through which it is proposed to build this branch road than he is. The Senator from California has very correctly stated what was the purpose of Congress at the time this branch was provided for, and the Senator from Michigan has correctly stated what is the purpose of this bill, namely, to set aside the President's order, to violate, as I apprehend, the contract now existing between the Federal Government and the company that was designated by the President of the United States to build this road, and then to allow a competing line to construct a road up the valley of the Niobrara, a valley which every gentleman who ever passed through it, so far as I know, beginning with Lieutenant Warren, will admit that it is impossible that a railroad can be built through.

Mr. SUMNER. Why?

Mr. GRIMES. It cannot be built for the reason that there is no timber; it goes through what are called the bad lands. One half of the country or a large part of the country through it is what is known as the alkali land, sand-hills, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] correctly suggests, who has been through that country himself, I think—sand-hills on both sides that never will admit of any population; and to-day you have not got twenty-five hundred people in the whole Territory of Dakota through which it is proposed to build it; and if it were built, let me say it would require as a subsidy—and I think the gentlemen who are upon the Committee on the Pacific Railroad will confirm what I say—$50,000,000 more than it would to build this road.

Mr. CONNESS. Allow me to make an inquiry as to the last expression of the Senator, in comparing these two routes, so called. I desire to know what he means by "this road." Does he mean the designated route, the map of which is in the Interior Department?

Mr. GRIMES. The nearest practical route.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will address himself to that question.

Mr. GRIMES. I will. The seventeenth section of the act which was read by the Senator from Michigan does not in his estimation authorize the President of the United States to designate this company now before us to build this road. Let us look at that section. It reads as follows:

"That so much of section fourteen of said act as relates to a branch from Sioux City be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: that whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through the State of Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City, such company, now organized or as may hereafter be organized under the laws of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, or Nebraska, as the President of the United States, by its request, may designate or approve for that purpose, shall construct and operate a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route to such a point on, and so as to connect with, the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as such company may select, and on the same terms and conditions as are provided in this act and the act to which this is an amendment, for the construction of the said Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line and branches; and said company shall complete the same at the rate of fifty miles per year: Provided, That said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall be, and is hereby, released from the construction of said branch. And said company constructing said branch shall not be entitled to receive in bonds an amount larger than the said Union Pacific Railroad Company would be entitled to receive if it had constructed the branch under this act and the act to which this is an amendment; but said company shall be entitled to receive alternate sections of land for ten miles in width on each side of the same along the whole length of said branch: And provided further, That if a railroad should not be completed to Sioux City, across Iowa or Minnesota, within eighteen months from the date of this act, then said company designated by the President, as aforesaid—"

The Senator infers that the President had not any right until the expiration of those eighteen months to designate a company; but that is not the language of the act; that is not the tense in which this section is drawn.

"And provided further, That if a railroad should not be completed to Sioux City, across Iowa or Minnesota, within eighteen months from the date of this act, then said company designated by the President, as aforesaid, may commence, continue, and complete the construction of said branch as contemplated by the provisions of this act."

In accordance with the construction which the President of the United States put upon that law, and which I apprehend cannot be other than the correct construction, he made the following order:

Whereas the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, a company organized under the laws of Iowa, has requested the President of the United States to designate said company "for the purpose of constructing and operating a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City to such point on, and so as to connect with, the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as such company may select;"

Therefore be it known, That by the authority conferred upon the President of the United States by the seventeenth section of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," &c., I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby designate the said Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company for the purpose above mentioned.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

December 24, 1864.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no power in Congress to go beyond that act of the President; that when he had performed his duty in designating the company under the law which should be authorized to build the road there was the end of the matter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question, whether this company which has been designated by the President has made surveys and located the road. Has it made any investments?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. I say it seems to me, and I think the Senate must concur with me, that there was the end of the matter, and that there is no power in Congress to overthrow that contract, and that it is a manifest breach of public faith to attempt to do it. I undertake to say that gentlemen who are advocating this measure would not do it for themselves as private individuals in private transactions.

When that order was made by the President, designating the Pacific and Sioux City company as the proper corporation to construct this road, individuals were induced in different sections of the country to invest their money in the stock; surveys were made. I do not pretend to say that they have made the best survey and selected the best line that could have been selected. They thought it was the best one; but they have a corps of engineers this moment in the field attempting a better one.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to ask a question. On what route is this corps of engineers now engaged?

Mr. GRIMES. They are attempting to find a route by which they can build their road upon the nearest and most practicable way from Sioux City to strike the Union Pacific railroad. That is what they are trying to do. The Senator has alluded to the fact that this road from Sioux City runs in an easterly direction. It runs in an easterly direction from the simple fact—I think my colleague has been to Sioux City and knows the topography of that country—that it is impossible to cross the Missouri river at Sioux City. There is a rise of the bluff on the opposite side of several hundred feet, so that it is necessary for them to cut through the bluff below Sioux City, and run in a southeasterly direction for a few miles until they strike the bottom of the Missouri river. Perhaps it is not known to the Senator from Michigan that the only place where the bluff comes to the Missouri river in the whole State of Iowa is at Sioux City. On the opposite side are what are known as the black hills, extending down several miles, through which it would be just as impossible to ever construct a railroad that would be a paying road as it would be to construct one through the White mountains. But, Mr. President, it is not the purpose of the company that was incorporated under the laws of the State of Iowa to take any advantage of the Government. They desire to build the road upon the nearest and most practicable route; and in order to show that such is their sentiment, and to test the sense of the gentlemen who are so anxious to set aside the order designating this company, I propose to amend the bill of the Senator from Michigan by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following as a substitute:

That the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, designated by the President of the United States to construct the Sioux City branch of the Union Pacific railroad, shall construct said branch upon the best, most direct, and practicable route, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey without regard to the line designated upon the map placed on file by said company in the Department of the Interior.

It will be observed that the proposition I offer as a substitute for the bill advocated by the Senator from Michigan is that, without any regard to the survey to which he has alluded and the map which he has presented to the Senate, this road shall be built upon the nearest and most practicable route, subject to the future approval of the President of the United States, instead of leaving it as it now is, according to the position of the Senator from Michigan, on the map which he has presented to us. We have, I believe, within a short time organized an engineer board, a kind of Pacific railroad department, at the head of which I think we have an engineer. These surveys will hereafter be referred to that officer, and I am content that the company shall be required to build the road according to the plans that shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and by his engineers and the President of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. I differ from the Senator from Iowa as to the true construction of the seventeenth section of the act of 1864. According to his view, it was competent for the President at any time after the passage of that act to designate any company he might see fit for the construction of the Sioux City branch. It does seem to me that the simple reading of the statute is a full and complete answer to that position. It says that so much of section fourteen of the original act "as relates to the branch from Sioux City be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read," that "whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City," the President shall have this power of designation; and afterward in a subsequent proviso the section declares that this State road shall be completed within eighteen months, and if it is not completed within eighteen months then the company that may be designated by the President of the United States may proceed to build this branch. If the language, "whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through the State of Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City" does not imply until that act is done, until that condition is complied with by some company, I am unable to understand language. It is tantamount to declaring that after or upon the completion of a road to Sioux City through Minnesota or Iowa, the President may have power to designate a company to construct this branch; and that was manifestly the policy and intention of Congress at the time of passing the act; the object being to secure absolutely and beyond peradventure the construction of a road through Iowa or through Minnesota to Sioux City, so as to form a connection with the system of railroads that concentrate at Chicago, and for the benefit of the Northwest.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand my friend to say that President Lincoln transcended his power when he designated this company?

Mr. HOWARD. I think he did. I think it was an inadventure on his part. He could do this only after the completion of a road through Iowa or Minnesota, and not before. He assumed to exercise the power of designation before the completion of any such road, and there is no such road in existence.

The Senator from Iowa seems to insist that rights have become vested in the Sioux City Railroad Company, and that we cannot now interfere with this order without a violation of vested rights. I do not so understand it. I know of no right which has accrued to that company. The company have never applied a single dollar in the way of constructing this railroad. They have not broken ground; they have not chopped down a tree; they have not laid a tie; they have not advanced a single dollar for the construction of the road.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Senator will permit me to ask him a question. I believe I was earlier on that committee than the Senator from Michigan. I ask him whether he is not aware that the line designed to connect with Lake Superior by St. Paul and down to Sioux City, and thence to the one hundredth meridian, was not given a longer time for its construction than any other line because the country was new? Was it not understood that they would need more time to survey and find out appropriate routes? Then let me ask him further whether they have not been triangulating the whole thing from Cedar Falls down to the junction with the main line at the one hundredth meridian. If they have not been doing so, I have been misinformed.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not the means of assuring the honorable Senator from California whether private companies have been engaged in that enterprise, but I think it is highly probable they have been.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would ask him, then, whether the location of a road by excellent engineers is not the first term in the building of a road in a new country, and whether it is not one of the most expensive things.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand that the location of a road, by merely making surveys, constitutes any part of the building of the road.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask whether the location of a road in a new country is not of as much importance to the construction of the road as its grade or the putting on the track, when completed, of engines; whether it is not more important that the engineers should first locate a route.

Mr. HOWARD. I hardly think the Senator from California will insist on an elaborate answer to that question. The honorable Senator from Iowa states to the Senate that a route up the valley of the Niobrara river is impracticable and impossible on account of the want of timber and the general difficulty of the route. It is very true, as I have been informed, that a company has been formed in Dakota Territory that has in view a competition for the construction of this branch. Whether that company will proceed, in case it becomes designated under the act of 1864, to construct a road up the valley of the Niobrara, is more than I am able to say. I am not here as the advocate of the Niobrara route, but I must say that in my judgment the Senator from Iowa has been greatly misinformed as to the character of that route. If that route were adopted, the branch would commence at Sioux City, running up the valley of the Niobrara for a distance of about two hundred and sixty miles, and would then pass off toward the southwest and terminate probably at Fort Laramie, there forming a junction with the Union Pacific railroad proper. As to the character of this route I beg leave en passant to say that so far as I have been able to acquire information on the subject, I am compelled to differ very widely from the opinion formed of it by the Senator from Iowa. I have read with a good deal of care a report made by a Mr. Sawyer in 1865 of his explorations for a wagon road up that valley, and from the head waters of the Niobrara to Virginia City, in Montana Territory. This exploration was made in the summer of 1865. Of course it will not be possible for me to read more than very short extracts from it. He started to make his explorations from Sioux City; he proceeded up the valley of the Niobrara a distance of two hundred and sixty-five miles, and then passed off further to the northwest on his way to Virginia City, which was the terminus of his exploration, for the purpose of establishing the route of that wagon road. He says in his report:

"Accompanying the expedition were five emigrant teams and a private freight train of thirty-six wagons, coupled together so as to be drawn by eighteen teams of six yoke of oxen each, and heavily loaded, some teams being loaded with sixty-four hundred pounds; and here permit me to say that the entire practicability of the route traveled over may be seen when I state that not one of these wagons were uncoupled during the journey for the passage of any obstacle in the road."

On reading the report you will be struck, sir, with this fact, that the valley of the Niobrara river, so far as he explored and examined it, is found to be well provided with timber, with water, and with grass. In a letter which Mr. Sawyer wrote only a short time since, remarking upon the character of that valley, he says:

"I should think from my observations and from those of my surveyors that a railroad might be constructed up the Niobrara to Laramie at a reasonable cost per mile: there is no range of mountains to cross, and the excavation and embankment would be about the same as upon roads in Iowa and Illinois."

I have no doubt that upon a more complete and thorough exploration of the country through the valley of the Niobrara it will be found that a railroad is entirely practicable upon that route. There has been, however, no very thorough exploration of the route from the head waters of the Niobrara river over to Fort Laramie. Still the committee were informed by a very intelligent gentleman who had repeatedly traveled over that part of the route between Laramie and the head waters of the Niobrara, that in his opinion a railroad was entirely practicable between these two points.

I beg to add, for the information of the Senate, that the Territorial Legislature of Dakota, in January, 1865, in a memorial which they addressed to Congress upon the subject, remonstrated very strongly against the construction of the road upon the ox-bow line which has been adopted in the map of the Sioux City Railroad Company. They use this language:

"We are also informed that there is some talk of a route down the valley of the Missouri river, to unite with the Central or Iowa branch of the Pacific railroad at or near the mouth of the Elkhorn, a tributary of the Platte river."

That is the route now under discussion.

"Such a route would run about south from Sioux City for nearly one hundred and fifty miles. This would necessitate all the above roads [referring to the roads coming from Minnesota and Wisconsin and Illinois] to run at least two hundred miles out of the most direct route by the way of the Niobrara valley. That is to say, when the roads are completed it would necessitate the business on these four roads to travel at least two hundred miles further to reach the passes in the Rocky mountains than would be necessary should that Sioux City branch run up the Niobrara valley or by the way direct from Chicago. It needs no argument to prove that such a route would not be of any practical value or importance whatever to those roads. The only one that would in the slightest degree be benefited by such a diversion of that branch would be the aforesaid road via Dubuque, known as the Dubuque and Sioux City railroad. But we do most earnestly protest against a policy which would favor that or any other of these roads at the expense of all the others, as that supposed south route assuredly would."

The Legislature of Minnesota during the same winter also remonstrated against the adoption of this ox-bow route. They observe, in their preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas by several acts of Congress liberal grants of public lands have been made for the construction of a railroad from the head of Lake Superior southwesterly via St. Paul to a point on the western boundary of Iowa, at or near the parallel of forty-two and a half degrees of north latitude, intersecting in its passage a railroad running westwardly from Winona, and another running up the valley of the Root river, in Minnesota, and one from McGregor, in Iowa, and connecting with the North or Sioux City branch of the Pacific railroad at the above point; that southwestern road operating as a main trunk to all the others; and whereas the best interests of all of those roads, as well as of the country through which they run, and the whole region of country westwardly thereof, require and demand that that branch should run westwardly on the nearest, most direct, and most practicable route to unite with the main trunk in the neighborhood of Fort Laramie; and whereas a diversion of that branch from that route to the Platte valley route, thereby increasing very materially the distance, will be destructive of the best interests of those roads and the country through which they run, as also a palpable violation of the spirit and evident intention of the law creating that branch: Therefore,

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best efforts and influence to secure the location of said branch westwardly, as near as may be, along the parallel of forty-two and a half degrees of north latitude to a point of junction with the main trunk, and so as in the most effectual manner to promote the best interests of all those roads and of the country through which they pass."

"Resolved, That they protest against and use their influence to prevent that branch from being diverted down the valley of the Missouri river to unite with the Platte valley route."

I have, I believe, presented to the Senate all the material facts connected with this bill. The committee had it under consideration at several meetings; they listened to the statements of many very intelligent gentlemen connected with these various routes; they examined the law as carefully as they were able, and they came to the conclusion that the best course to be adopted was to set aside the order of the President of December 24, 1864, and thus to leave the whole subject open to fair and honorable competition between the railroad companies that might see fit to compete for the privilege of constructing this branch.

The Senator from Iowa proposes to amend the bill; and if I understand the drift and purpose of his amendment, it simply proposes to set aside the map which has already been filed by the Sioux City company, to treat it as a nullity, and to authorize this company hereafter to construct this branch wherever they may see fit to construct it, by the approbation of the President, thus leaving in their hands the exclusive privilege of constructing the branch, and excluding all other companies from competition with it for that privilege.

Sir, I object to this. It is no remedy for the evils which at present exist. The statute of 1864, in and of itself at the present time, contains full authority to the President of the United States to designate this company or any other company that he may select for the purpose of building this branch. The Senator from Iowa tenaciously clings to the privilege which he seems to think has already been acquired by this company. I wish to disengage its grasp upon this privilege. Without intending to cast any reflection whatever on the character of the gentlemen connected with the company, I must repeat that I cannot but regard the route adopted by them, running, as it does, a circuitous route to the southeast, then to the south, then to the southwest, through a large portion of the State of Iowa, and terminating upon the Omaha branch at Frémont, thus advancing to the west only five miles at the utmost from the point of beginning, as a very plain departure, as an evasion of the plain intent and meaning of the statute of 1864; and for one I cannot consent that a company who has resorted to such a course shall continue to grasp the privilege it seeks to enjoy. I think we ought to unclasp that grip if it be possible.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not detain the Senate long in what I shall have to say on this subject, and will endeavor to make myself as well understood as possible. The subject-matter of this bill and the question to which it relates received more continuous consideration from the Pacific Railroad Committee of this body than perhaps any other single question that has ever been referred to that committee. Parties interested on both sides of the question were heard at many successive meetings. They were heard chiefly on the question of routes—the relative advantage of one route as against the others. This company that the President of the United States has designated, as has been stated by the Senator from Iowa, has been organized and issued stock and taken steps of that kind, a disturbance to which would lead to a great deal of injury to private parties. I wish to disabuse the mind of the Senate upon that point. This company is an organization of other railroad companies running through the State of Iowa, and perhaps Wisconsin and contiguous States. They organized together to construct this branch for the purpose of giving a western connection to all their roads with the Union Pacific Railroad Company. The act of 1864 has been read from. The seventeenth section of that act gives authority to the President to make the designation of a company for building this branch, and such authority is to be found nowhere else. I will read from it a very few lines; it provides that—

"Whenever a line of railroad shall be completed through the State of Iowa or Minnesota to Sioux City, such company, now organized or as may hereafter be organized under the laws of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, or Nebraska, as the President of the United States, by its request, may designate or approve for that purpose, shall construct and operate" this branch of the Pacific railroad. This act was passed in 1864, nearly two years since, but the connection predicated in this section has never yet been made. No line of railroad has yet reached Sioux City. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether I am correct in stating that no line of railroad has yet reached Sioux City from the east.

Mr. GRIMES. None, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well. The Senator calls my attention to another provision in this section which I desire to read, for I wish it distinctly understood that I have no interest in this case; I sat in the committee as a juror and heard all that was said. The second proviso in this section the Senator claims, and perhaps correctly, should be construed in connection with the first part of the section. That proviso reads thus:

"And provided further, That if a railroad shall not be completed to Sioux City across Iowa or Minnesota within eighteen months from the date of this act."

The eighteen months have passed and it has not been done—

"then said company designated by the President, as aforesaid, may commence, continue, and complete the construction of said branch as contemplated by the provisions of this act."

That proviso seems to be inconsistent with the first part of the provision which I read, and to provide that if within eighteen months no road should reach Sioux City from the east the company designated by him should go on and construct this branch. There really appears to be a conflict between the two provisions.

There are two questions to be considered in connection with this bill now before us; and they are separate questions. One is, whether the President made a legal designation when he designated this company for the construction of this branch, and whether if he did not make a legal designation it is good policy for Congress now to make that designation or confirm the one that he made, and give the building of this branch to this company, which I will call the Iowa company for the purpose of being understood. The other question relates entirely to routes; and they are totally distinct.

In regard to the investigations had before the Pacific Railroad Committee, I desire to state to the Senate that the bulk of what was said by the advocates of both parties in interest related directly to routes, and not to this designation, for so far as the designation is concerned, the Senate have it all here in the two provisions I have read, and are entirely competent to decide without any discussion; and so were the committee who had the matter in charge. But upon routes there was a great deal said. Gentlemen connected with Dakota Territory came before the committee and advocated the setting aside the order of the President, as proposed by the bill of the honorable chairman of the committee, so that they could come forward and organize a company, alleging that they had the most direct westwardly route up what is called the Niobrara river, a branch of the Missouri. Much was said in regard to the practicability of constructing a line upon that branch; and I must say here that so far as I am a judge of a mountain country—and I live in one, and have for years—and could construe what was said by the advocates of the Niobrara route, my conclusion was, and I could not escape from it, that there was no practicable or fair route up the Niobrara.

It was described by themselves as a river with a very narrow valley—in our country we would call it a cañon—a deep cut in a very hilly country, with precipitous bluffs very generally; and a country over which now mule trains travel with considerable difficulty; and where wagons travel they are compelled in all cases, as was stated, I believe, before the committee, to take the tops of the ridges, and cannot go up the valley of that river; in other words the river has no valley connected with it.

Then, so far as the Niobrara route is concerned, and so far as it affects the question now before the Senate, my judgment was and is that it cuts no figure in the case, that it is an impracticable sand-hill region, not profitable to construct a branch of the Pacific railroad through.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Senator from California permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Has my colleague, the Senator from California, ever studied anything of engineering or mountain countries? I ask an answer.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think that has any relevancy to this subject. If the Senator's colleague has not, he is certainly willing to concede that his colleague has studied sufficient for both.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Ah! the better man of the two, then.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, Mr. President, there is another fact that appears, so far as the Niobrara route is concerned, in the discussions that were had before the committee, namely, that if it were adopted by the order of Congress for the construction of a Pacific railroad branch, it would make a very long and a very expensive route to the Treasury of the United States before it could connect westwardly with the Union Pacific railroad, and that is an additional reason why it should not be adopted. The time will doubtless come, when more population gets into that country, that branch roads will connect with the main trunk or Union Pacific railroad; but that time, in my judgment, is not yet.

Now, sir, the question directly before us, and the cause of the introduction of this measure, is the line located from Sioux City, east of the Missouri river, and crossing the Missouri river a considerable distance south of Sioux City and thence running to Fremont, where it connects, I believe, with the Omaha branch of the Pacific railroad. It appears that this Iowa company have deposited the map now before me, as the plat of their route, in the office of the Secretary of the Interior; and the lands, I suppose, have been withdrawn from the market in accordance with law. I believe that the construction of a road over this route would be unwise, inasmuch as it runs eastward and not westward, and that this route, as contemplated by the language of the substitute of the Senator from Iowa, would be set aside. Certainly the United States are not willing to build a branch of the Pacific railroad from Sioux City, which shall run eastward, and in the length of one hundred miles only make five miles of westward distance. The route which the company has adopted, as shown by the map which has been deposited, is one that ought to be set aside. I think, as I suppose all right-minded persons think, that the route should be left to engineering. I have no objection, and never saw any during the discussion, to this Iowa company, composed of owners of contiguous railroads interested in seeking this western connection, being the company to build the branch. Indeed, my opinion is that they are the best able to build it; that committed to their hands it will be built soonest and best, for we have, in addition to the motive of personal interest that they will have in assuming the franchise, the amount of interest they have in seeking the connection by their other and existing roads. But whether the President had a legal right to designate them is a question for the Senate to decide. Whether it is well for Congress now to confirm that designation is a question also for the Senate to decide, and I have no advice to give upon these propositions.

When the bill before us was in committee it seemed to me not an extravagant thing to recommend that the bill should pass as agreed on by the committee; in other words, I thought this company would eventually build the road in any case, that they were the company best able, organized for the purpose, determined to take the franchise, able to go on with the surveys and demonstrate the best route. I thought they would eventually get it in any case. As to these other companies spoken of by the Senator from Michigan, I think none of them are yet organized.

Mr. HOWARD. They are.

Mr. CONNESS. There are companies organized?

Mr. HOWARD. Very responsible companies.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Michigan says they are organized, and are very responsible companies; that had passed my attention. I do not know but that I have said all on this subject that I need at this time say. My only purpose in rising was to show that the committee had fairly and fully considered the case; that they had considered the question of whether the President should have designated this company or not; that they had considered the ability of this company to construct the road; that they had considered the cheapest line of construction for the Government, and that they had also considered the best route for its construction over. I have no feeling in the premises, but, as I authorized the report to be made, I shall vote, of course, to sustain that report. If the Senate should not adopt it, then I should be willing to accept the other proposition, that coming from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, this is an opportune occasion for me to make a remark due to myself and my relations to my State. It happened to be the fact that I introduced the first bill for a Pacific railroad in the House of Representatives long years ago. I was chairman then of that committee. I introduced the first carefully prepared bill in this body, and was chairman of the committee. I, the voice of the majority governing, after having reported and helped to pass the first bill that ever did pass in Congress, was superseded by the sober Senator from California. I inhabited the city of San Francisco, the metropolitan city of the Pacific. His antecedent in the House resisted the Pacific railroad going to San Francisco; and my colleague resisted the Pacific railroad going to the great metropolitan city, a place of which Humboldt spoke when he traveled along California's mountains and valleys long years ago. This from personal local considerations he did; and I know those considerations, and I affirm them now, and I do it for my own dignity and for the respect I have for the high senatorial office. The opportunity has not come before for me to say this; but what I say is the perfect truth. He did this for personal reasons, not for public. I do not think he understands the dignity of office. A man may play fantastic tricks so far as he himself is concerned; but when he accepts office and represents others he must be careful that he does the full measure of his duty; and it is my impression that he never learned to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The remarks of the Senator of a personal character are decided to be out of order.

Mr. CONNESS. Only because what the Senator has said will be printed in the Globe, as I hope it will be every word—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Every word.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will now be silent. Only because it will be printed in the Globe do I rise to make any response; otherwise I never would respond to what my colleague says in the Senate of the United States, but what he says goes out in print as the words of a Senator, and if no notice be taken of it here the public at large cannot but understand that the object of his animadversions deserved those animadversions. The Senate will bear me witness to-day, as they will since I have been in this body, that I came here for business, that I have made honest endeavors to represent the interests, the best interests, of the people who honored me by selecting me as a Senator. The testimony of the Senate on both sides I have no fear but that I can receive on that point. That this morning should be selected by him who unfortunately represents my State in this august body, to make a personal attack upon myself—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator give way?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Not for a question?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's colleague does not give way.

Mr. CONNESS. That this assault should come this morning while we are engaged in the duties of our high office in considering a subject relating to the public weal lying outside of the State of California, can only be accounted for by the Senator who has made it being in that unfortunate condition which has led to so much disgrace to our State.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I have a right to call the Senator to order and to pronounce that a falsehood. I have that right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order, but he must state it in parliamentary language; otherwise the Chair cannot entertain any motion from the Senator. Does he make a point of order on what the Senator [Mr. CONNESS] says? If so, he will state his point of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will state the point of order, then. A man who makes an insulting remark on the floor of the Senate, if it is a false remark, may be corrected by the statement of the term "falsehood," which is parliamentary; it is so in Great Britain and so in the United States. I desire to pronounce that a falsehood, and I am within the rule as it is laid down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] will proceed.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I hope I shall be protected from these interruptions in what I shall have to say in future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to enforce the rules of the body.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the indulgence of the reporter, else the remarks that I have made and what I wish to make will necessarily lack coherency. I was saying, sir, that the assault both in time and in character made by the Senator would not have been made on this occasion were he not in the condition which has led to so much disgrace to our State and has so often led to public shame in this august body.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Again—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must observe order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Again I call the Senator to order, and again I say—

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Chair will keep order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's undertaking to pronounce what his colleague states to be untrue is not a point of order; and the Senator must not interrupt. He will have his opportunity to reply if any misstatement is made.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the President allow me to state what I think to be the true rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator makes a point of order, the Chair will entertain the point of order. The Senator from California on the left of the Chair [Mr. CONNESS] has the floor and must not be interrupted unless he is called to order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The point of order I will state. It is not—

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the Senator must not be allowed to proceed. He must make his point of order and then take his seat.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have the floor, having risen to state a point of order. Not having stated the point of order, I still have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California rose to a point of order and has not stated it. The Chair entertains his motion only on the ground that he is stating his point of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to state what I think to be the rule, which is, as far as I have been instructed about parliamentary law, that a person speaking personally, as the Senator, my colleague—

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I believe I am entitled to the floor. I object to this. If the Senator has a point of order to make, I hope he will be made to state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the object of the Chair. The Senator [Mr. McDOUGALL] is stating his point of order as the Chair understands. If he is not stating a point of order he is clearly out of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am only stating it. I am trying to get at it carefully so that I may be exact. If I am wrong I have no doubt the President will rule right. If the Senator, my colleague, had risen in his place and objected to some things I said, I think he might have made a point of order on me.

Mr. SUMNER. I rise again to a question of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am on the floor on a point of order.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is arguing a case.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am not. I am approaching the statement. Permit me, Mr. Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to make my statement. If a person says a thing on the floor of the Senate that undignifies a Senator he has the right to rebuke it by proper terms. That is the point of order, and so it has been ruled in Parliament, and so it has been ruled in this Senate for fifty years. That is the point of order. That is all I want to state, so that the President will understand that I have the privilege to rebuke a false assertion, it being personal to myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that what the Senator now states is a point of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a point of order. It is my right to have such an assertion corrected whenever I ask a correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from California on the right [Mr. McDOUGALL] to deny the truth of some assertions made by the Senator from California on the left, [Mr. CONNESS.] The Chair does not think that a point of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think the Chair does not understand me. I think the Chair did not understand the remarks of the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] There is the point. The Senator from California, my colleague, made a remark that was personal to myself, not an opinion or a matter of discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] will proceed. The Chair perceives no point of order in the matter stated.

Mr. CONNESS. If my purpose had ever been at any time, or if I ever could entertain the purpose, which I never have, to reflect upon my colleague, the Senator in this body, it were entirely unnecessary; the conduct of the Senator here furnishes the most severe reflection that could possibly be uttered by human tongue.

The Senator, as I have once taken occasion to state in defense of my State, does not represent the State of California in any sense, either political or moral. The Senator was enfranchised with the senatorial office by that great State five years ago, since which time the Senator has never returned to see his constituents or that they might see him; and yet I have been put to the constant test in this body of bearing and submitting—feeling proud of the people I represent here—to the assumptions of representation of them made by that Senator. I have borne it, sir; I have sat in my place when that Senator, so far from representing that high-toned, moral, and courageous constituency and great sovereignty, was sitting in his chair, or rather lying in his chair, the object of pity, before an audience assembled here from nearly every State in the Union. I have covered my eyes more than once in shame before these exhibits. My associates in this body must not understand that I am dead to considerations of this character, but, sir, silently and quietly, kindly even to him, I was biding the time when the Senator, by the termination of his official career, should cease thus to misrepresent, thus to humiliate, and thus to shed all the disgrace that was possible in him to do upon not only the State that honored him and enfranchised him, but upon the American character and upon the American Senate. But, sir, I cannot bear it this morning, in view of the wanton, unprovoked assault made upon myself.

The Senator rises here and bandies the word falsehood, Mr. President, against me. The Senator dare not do that out of this great body.

Mr. President, I dare not reply, for my senatorial character is in issue here, to conduct so despicable as that is. I dare not respond to it. Of my character for truth and veracity, for honor in the representative character, I have no comparison to make with him. I shrink from the contrast as I would from all the pollution that hell could vomit forth in its most disgusting convulsions. I have no contrast to make.

Mr. President, with gentleness, with kindness, with what was due to the senatorial relation, notwithstanding the provocations in every point of view—I would at any time since I have sat here have sacrificed them all before the high and imperious duty of vindicating this great American forum and have cast a vote upon any day for the expulsion of the Senator because of his offenses committed here again and again against the dignity of this body; but, sir, I could not lead in such a work—the Senate has spared him; but forgetful of this consideration in his behalf, he has repeated again and again these outrages and violations of order and decorum and dignity until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue. The Senate have constantly done themselves and the country a wrong. It was not enough that this great body of which he became a member had by unanimity concluded that he should not be permitted longer to sit in its committees to consider legislative questions. That silent but most positive condemnation, so far from bringing reformation and change, has but sunk and degraded the object still more, until having no character to lose, nothing in controversy, he rises and commits the last offense this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from California—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield the floor?

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from California will permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. As far as any necessary vindication of his character is concerned, I submit to the honorable Senator whether he has not gone far enough.

Mr. CONNESS. I was about to close.

Mr. JOHNSON. And I am sure—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Permit me a remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor by consent of the Senator from California.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask him to permit me a remark—

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland does not give way and must not be interrupted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure that it would be agreeable to the Senate, and to all who hold in respect the character of the body, that a discussion like this should terminate.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I beg to say to the Senator from Maryland, to the honorable President, and to the Senate, that I feel as deeply as any human being can feel the pain of this whole proceeding; but I began by remarking that what is said in this Chamber goes out as the record of this great body, and, so far as the public at large and outside readers are concerned, we are all equal here; and therefore, provoked again and again, I cannot, either for myself or for the State that I in part endeavor to represent here, be silent longer. If I have, Mr. President, by manner, by word, or by inopportune occasion offended the Senate, or any Senator, certainly there is no person to whom it would communicate more pain than myself, and there is none who would withdraw any offense committed either to an individual or to the body where I was than myself. I am done, Mr. President.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I shall be more respectful; I will not speak of "the sober Senator from California;" I will speak of the superb Senator with the superior voice. There is a little story told of one of the best men in America—Mr. Pettigru, of Charleston, South Carolina. Having advocated a cause in which he had occasion to denounce the client of the opposite counsel and his family for having been guilty of perjury, the fighting man of the family came from the mountains, which are a branch of the Alleghenies in that region, and came up to Mr. Pettigru, who was walking along in the old-fashioned style, with his green bag under his arm. This big, tall fellow came up and said to him, "You are a God damned liar." Mr. Pettigru did not notice it. Then said he, "You are a damned scoundrel." Mr. Pettigru did not pretend to see him at all, but walked along toward home, like a gentleman. "Mr. Pettigru," said he, then, "you are a God damned son of a bitch."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the repetition of such stories is disorderly, and ought not to be indulged in in the Senate.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Very well, then, I will give the climax of the thing, which I think will not be rude, because it was done by a gentleman. When he said this, Mr. Pettigru knocked him down, and said to him, "You may lie as much as you please, but this is the way I notice such remarks as you made last." Now, I say simply, as these are lies, they do not undignify me, for I am conscious of my own rectitude.

Now, let me pursue this matter one step further. I am not going to be disorderly. I will give what is due to myself and to the other Senator from California. In the year 1852 I determined to be a candidate for the Federal Congress a few days before the convention of my party met, when my colleague, the other Senator from California, professed to be of the same party with myself. After notifying my friends at home in San Francisco, I took vessel and went to Sacramento, the seat of government. I arrived there after midnight, and early in the morning I arose to see my friends there and notify them of the fact that I would be a candidate for their suffrages. What happened then is the basis of all this. I walked down stairs, and at the door of the hotel I found a Senator of my State whom I knew well and who had invited me to be a candidate. I said to him, "Captain Walton, I have changed my mind since I saw you." The Senator had invited me with great earnestness, had spent some days in inducing me to become a candidate for the Federal House of Representatives. Said I, "I have changed my mind; I have determined to become a candidate." He said to me, calling me "General," which was my soubriquet, "I regret it; you know how earnestly I urged you to become a candidate, and after leaving you I immediately went to the city of Stockton and offered my support to Major Hammond," who had then been Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State. Said I, "Certainly, I remember your kindness, and under the circumstances I cannot ask your support." A man was introduced to me at that time by Captain Walton whom I addressed with the cordiality that belongs to western habits. He said, "Captain Walton does not own all the county of El Dorado; I have as much to say about that as he has, and I am going there this morning by stage. In the county of El Dorado you are more highly regarded, and with proper opportunities you can obtain our suffrages, and I will see that you are properly represented." The man being a stranger to me, that being the first opportunity of his coming within my vision, I did not rely on that, and sent to El Dorado, one of the principal counties of my State. After having advised my friends that I was a candidate, I returned to the city of Benicia, where the convention was held.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would desire to conclude my sentence; I have not completed it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator is entitled to the floor, but I desire to call the attention of the Senator to a fact, if he has no objection. That fact is that the question under consideration is in regard to this Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. McDOUGALL. But this is a personal controversy, and I wish to state the controversy as it is. Permit me to proceed. I shall not take three minutes. I want to state the cause why.

The convention met four days thereafter. I was well advised that the person who had volunteered El Dorado to me had become my adversary. He came to the convention with his followers. He did not call upon me, but cast his vote against me. I was not troubled, because I was advised; I was forewarned and forearmed. After I was nominated on the first ballot, by a handsome majority, he came to me and said, "I congratulate you, sir, as a Representative from the State of California." Said I, "Sir, I do not know how well you can congratulate me, or how well you can afford to offer me your hand. You had given me the assurances of support, and you made a speech against the person who seconded my nomination, and cast your vote against me. You have a right to change your opinions, and I not being informed of the reason why you cast your vote against me, must say that to me, without information, it looks much like treachery. Permit me to inquire, if you had a cause, why you did not give me the explanation, and inform me, first, that you had changed your opinion, and secondly, the reason why." "Oh," said he, "I found out that you are too much of a southern man for me;" and he cast his vote for a man who had sent a circular around for establishing slavery in California.

Sir, those men who have wronged you once, and know they have wronged you, will always be your adversaries. I do not speak otherwise than as can be interpreted by the Senator across the way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is not the desire of Senators to have a vote on the bill which is immediately before the Senate, I will move its postponement with a view to take up the bill that was under consideration the other day for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery, and upon which I was submitting some remarks to the Senate at the time an adjournment took place. If Senators think we can reach a vote on this bill to-day—I desire a vote upon it—I shall not interpose the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I think we can soon come to a vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest, inasmuch as an important amendment has been offered by the Senator from Iowa, that the bill had better go over and let that amendment be printed.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not object to that. But I beg leave to make one single remark before the subject passes over this morning. It was observed by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] that he supposed the lands on the route marked upon the map which I have furnished had been withheld from the market for the benefit of the company. In that respect I think the honorable Senator has been misinformed.

Mr. CONNESS. I rather asked it as a question.

Mr. HOWARD. Such is not the fact. The lands upon the route marked upon the map have not been reserved at the Department of the Interior, as I have been informed, and I think that the company have made no progress whatever in regard to this road. Whether they have made an actual survey of the route marked down on the map is more than I am able to say. I apprehend, however, that they have not. Possibly they may have surveyed a portion of the route, but I apprehend they have not surveyed it all.

In this connection I beg leave to be indulged in one further remark: the statute of Iowa authorizing the establishment of corporations of this description, which are called in the statute "associations," requires that the articles of association which stand as the charter of the company, taken in connection with the general act, should set forth the conditions and times on which the stock of the company is to be paid in—a very important provision as I regard it—the object of the statute being to require the actual payment in, at certain times to be fixed by the articles of association, of the capital of the company. The Sioux City company, in their articles of association, seem to have overlooked that very important clause in the general statute of Iowa, and in their articles they say:

"The capital stock of said company shall be $6,000,000, which shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and may be taken by individuals and corporations, to be paid in such installments as said company may require, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions as may be provided by the board of directors."

Leaving the whole matter of the payment of stock by the stockholders discretionary with the board of directors, who may call it in or omit to call it in, as they choose. They may call it in at one time or another time, as they may choose. There being no time fixed in the articles of association for calling in the capital stock, it would seem that if the board of directors were so disposed, they might omit entirely to require the payment of any cash capital by any stockholder of the company, which certainly, as I think, would be a violation of the general act of Iowa to which I have referred. Whether they could construct this road out of the subsidy and the lands, I do not know; but I must confess, looking at the articles of association, it appears to me very much as if that were their purpose, not intending on their part to make any very liberal contributions in cash.

Mr. GRIMES. I hardly suppose that the Senate is prepared to sit as a court of appeals to decide whether or not corporations created by the State of Iowa under their laws are valid or not. All that I have to say in reply to the Senator from Michigan is, that I know several of the persons who are connected with this company. I know that they are very pure men, very able men, and are capable of building the road; and I think that they probably are as well qualified to discharge this duty as the gentlemen who compose the adverse company, with the members of which I suppose the Senator is familiar, for I believe they are generally from the town in which he has his residence. I have no doubt the persons who are seeking to get the control of this road in opposition to the company to which the grant was made by the President are all very respectable people; but the charter, as I suppose, and have believed, and am informed, is in strict accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa.

Mr. HOWARD. It was not my intention to sit as a judge upon the question whether this Sioux City company is legally incorporated or not. That was the furthest possible thing from my mind. I felt it a duty, however, to call the attention of the Senate to this important fact, and it will have such weight as Senators choose to give it.

As to the other company to which the Senator alluded, I have only knowledge of but one or two members of it. Very few, however, of the members of the company to which the Senator refers, reside at Detroit; and as to those, I can assure the Senator that they are gentlemen of the highest responsibility and untarnished honesty and honor as business men—men who would delight in exercising the privilege of carrying through this important work as expeditiously as possible; men who would be sure to accomplish their object. As to the character of the stockholders of the Sioux City company, I know much less of them than the honorable Senator from Iowa does. I presume, however, they are all excellent business men—men of responsibility. I have been so told; but I cannot, just at this point, suppress the fact appearing before us in public documents now on our tables, that three of the stockholders, three of the members of the board of directors of that company, are members of the present Congress—members of the House of Representatives. I think it proper to state that fact for the information of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say in response to that that the Senator is mistaken. I believe that one of the members of the House of Representatives of my State assisted in forming the company, but when the company was formed he ceased to have any connection with the road. I think that one member of Congress is one of the members of this company. I do not know that there is any particular impropriety in that. I do not know that it is any more improper than it is for the Senator's constituent, who holds an office in the Territory of Dakota, to be a lobby member about this body, as he has been ever since this session of Congress commenced, for the purpose of securing this grant to the adverse company, of which he is a member. I simply desire to repel the inference that might be drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Michigan that there was anything improper on the part of these gentlemen who were members of the House of Representatives. One of them I think is a very worthy member from the State of Massachusetts, as good a man, as pure a man, and as competent a man, according to my knowledge of him—and I think that is the opinion held of him by his own constituents and by the people of that Commonwealth—as ever had a seat in the Halls of Congress; and I can make the same remark, with perfect propriety and truth, in regard to my colleague of the House of Representatives. I do not know with what purpose it was that the Senator from Michigan saw fit to drag in the names of these gentlemen and put them upon the record here. I can only say, whatever that motive may have been, that, in the estimation of their friends, nothing that he can say can injure them.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly it was not my purpose to introduce the names, and I have not introduced the names, of any members of Congress from the State of Iowa as members of this company. That is not necessary. I referred to that fact, however, to account, if possible, for this strenuous opposition which has been made, and probably will hereafter be made, to the passage of the bill now before the Senate. I, like the Senator from Iowa, see no impropriety in a member of Congress being connected with a railroad company, being a stockholder or director; there is certainly nothing disreputable in that; but that would naturally be a circumstance, so far as a member of Congress is concerned, inducing one to be tolerably vigilant in regard to his rights and in regard to the rights of his company. That is all that I intended.

As to the other gentleman to whom the Senator has seen fit to allude—a private gentleman of spotless reputation—

Mr. GRIMES. He holds an office in Dakota Territory.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; I believe he is surveyor of the Territory of Dakota, and has been absent, on leave, for a number of months, from his post of duty, and has spent much of his time at Washington. What may have been his business entirely, I am unable to say. It is true, however, that he is friendly to the passage of this bill, as he has a right to be, as every man in Dakota and elsewhere has a right to be. I do not know of any reason in morality or politics or law that would exclude a gentleman holding a public office from taking an interest in any public measure pending before Congress. I do not know why he should be ostracized simply because he is a public officer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed with a view of taking up the bill for the relief of the contractors for building the iron-clads.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Indiana desires to address the Senate upon the bill to which he alludes, I, of course, will make no objection to that bill coming up, but I desire, if possible, to call up House bill No. 233, with regard to the habeas corpus, which was under consideration some days ago, and which is a bill of public importance; and I should be glad, if the Senator does not wish to address the Senate, if he would let that bill come up instead of the one to which he alludes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate but briefly.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, if the Senator desires to occupy it at all, I will not interpose another motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, will perhaps offer some amendments which may remove all objection to the bill I have named, and it need not occupy very much time if he takes that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill now before the Senate be postponed, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa be printed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOWARD. If the bill now before the Senate is to be postponed, I beg to suggest that it be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no; do not assign a day for it.

Mr. WADE. I hope there will be no assignments that will prevent me from calling up a bill which, if it is to be passed upon at all, ought to be acted upon very soon.

Mr. SUMNER. What is that?

Mr. WADE. The bill to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company. If it is to be passed at all, it should be passed at once. I intended to call it up this morning, but this bill got ahead of me. I think this bill ought to be considered and passed at the earliest moment, and I should be glad if the Senate would agree to take it up now.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not go on with the business before us and finish it this afternoon?

Mr. HOWARD. I inferred from what the Senator from Indiana said that he desired to speak on this bill, and wished it postponed for that reason.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not at all.

Mr. HOWARD. If that be not the case, I think we had better come to a vote on this bill without a postponement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If we could reach a vote I should not interpose another motion; but I suppose this bill in regard to the Pacific railroad will occupy some further time, and I desire to conclude what I was saying at the time of the adjournment the other day, and I suppose that we can then dispose of the bill that I propose to call up in a very short time.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Indiana was cut off the other day in the middle of his speech I do not know why that would not come up as the unfinished business. I think he ought to have the privilege of concluding his remarks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed it would; but I did not want to interrupt other business.

Mr. GRIMES. It was understood a few minutes ago that this railroad bill would go over until to-morrow, and I know that two or three Senators left the Chamber under that impression. I think, therefore, it would be well for us to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, and let this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had insisted on its amendments to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to prohibit the sale of spirituous and other intoxicating liquors about the Capitol building and grounds, disagreed to by the Senate, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN WESTWORTH of Illinois, Mr. HIRAM PRICE of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1867;

A bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youly;

A bill (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Mrs. Isabella Fogg, of the State of Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore;

A bill (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins;

A bill (H. R. No. 443) granting a pension to Mr. Elizabeth York, widow of Shubal York, late a surgeon in the fifty-fourth regiment Illinois infantry volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 444) granting a pension to Lewis W. Dietrich; and

A bill (H. R. No. 446) for the relief of Nicholas Hibner, late a private in the sixth regiment Missouri State militia.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the message from the House of Representatives asking for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the resolution prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors in the Capitol building or grounds, disagreed to by the Senate and insisted on by the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the absence of the gentleman [Mr. WILSON] who introduced the resolution, and for him, although without authority, I will move that the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the President pro tempore appoint the managers at the conference on the part of the Senate. I hope that this will be considered as the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts who introduced the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

SARAH E. PICKELL.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, desiring to move a reconsideration of the vote indefinitely postponing the bill (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell, on his motion, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill of the House (No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell, which was indefinitely postponed by the Senate on the 13th instant.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not my intention to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a few moments in the further discussion of this bill. At the time of the adjournment on Wednesday last I was showing the effect of the action of the Department upon these contractors, and was illustrating it by the cases of three other vessels that were constructed by Messrs. Secor & Co., the Tecumseh, Mahopac, and Manhattan, three of the river and harbor monitors. As I said, the contract by Messrs. Secor & Co. for the construction of those vessels was made on the 1st of September, 1862, and they were to be completed in six months, but in fact they were not completed for about eighteen months. Now, I wish to show to the Senate how it came that they were not completed within the time or within a short time after the time limited, and what was the effect of that delay in the completion of the vessels upon the contractors themselves.

The contract price for these vessels was considerably above a million dollars, and the work was commenced, I believe, almost immediately after the contract was made; but very shortly afterward the superintendent commenced making changes in the plans of the vessels and in the mode of doing the work. I will show the extent to which the changes were ordered. I will refer very briefly to some of the evidence that was before the board.

These contracts, as I have said, were made on the 1st of September. In the latter part of September the first instructions were given, the drawings of the particular plans, Nos. 2, 6, 5, 8, and 7, signed by Stimers, the general inspector.

"On the 9th of October, a second specification was received from the general inspector which demanded the following changes from the specifications upon which we built."

The changes are given; the different items; the cost of these changes amounting to a good many thousands of dollars. The Senate will observe that that was a little more than a month after the contracts were made. Then again on the 14th of October, a month and a half after the contracts were made, other changes were ordered; again on the 14th of November; again on the 19th of November, and the last modifications were very extensive, involving a great change in the plan of the work and a great increase of the cost of the vessels. On the 15th of January other instructions were received, and from time to time thereafter almost during the entire time of the construction of the vessels. Messrs. Secor & Co., I believe, built five vessels in all, two of this particular class, and (upon which they sustained such serious loss) they built three vessels, the Tecumseh, the Mahopac, and Manhattan, river and harbor monitors, a very important class of vessels. The Senate will observe on page 9 of the report a copy of one of the letters written by Stimers, as general inspector, to the contractors. That letter is dated December 22, 1862. It commences thus:

"GENERAL INSPECTOR'S OFFICE,
IRON-CLAD STEAMERS,
"413 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, December 22, 1862."

"GENTLEMEN: You are probably aware that the iron-clad steamers Mahopac, Tecumseh, and Manhattan, now in process of construction by you, are, in their general plan, simply a modification of the Passec class. That the original design emanated from Captain Ericsson, the inventor of this system, and that this office was established by the Government for the purpose of making and issuing to the various builders of the vessels the detailed working drawings. The design of Captain Ericsson contemplated the deck covered with one inch thickness of iron. The deck planking and much of the side armor of pine wood, and all armor plates to be of fifteen sixteenths inch thick each.

"After this plan left the hand of the designer, there was added another inch to the thickness of the deck plating; the pine wood in the deck planks and side armor was changed to oak; the full thickness of one inch each was demanded for all armor plates; the weight of the boilers was increased fifteen per cent., and in some minor respects weight was added to what was originally intended, until, after having in vain protested against these additions, Captain Ericsson gave notice that he would no longer be responsible for the flotative power of these vessels. I have, therefore, caused the displacement and the weights to be carefully calculated, and, to avoid the necessity of carrying any ballast to balance the vessels, the calculations extended to balancing the weights equally with the displacement. As the result of these investigations, it has been determined to make the following alterations."

I will not undertake to describe to the Senate what these alterations amounted to, for I cannot very well understand them myself, not being a mechanic or engineer; but they were very important alterations. This was one of a series of communications from the general inspector to these contractors. This was about midway in the period fixed for the completion of the vessels, and from time to time onward alterations were made; so that, as a matter of course, the vessels had not approached completion when the time limited for their completion had expired. Again, on the 18th of June, 1863, very elaborate instructions were given by General Inspector Stimers to the contractors. Senators will find that letter on the 10th, 11th, and 12th pages of the report, and can see by referring to it the extent of the alterations and modifications of the work.

Now, sir, what was the effect of it? As I said the other day, the entire alterations and modifications of the plan of these vessels caused extra work to be required, amounting to above half a million of dollars. That extra work was paid for by the Department. There is no claim by these contractors for that. The point is just this: that by requiring so much additional work and such a departure from the original plan from time to time, the work could not be completed within any reasonable period, and instead of the vessels being built from the 1st of September, 1862, to the 1st of March, 1863, the work ran through the whole of the year 1863 and up to March, April, and May, 1864. If Senators will turn to the 8th page of the report they can see the effect of this necessary delay, occasioned by the action of the Government or by the instructions of the general inspector, upon the contractors. As a part of this report, there is a statement of the advance in the price of labor and material, which is certified to be correct by Admiral Gregory who had charge of this work. Let us take a few of the items.

This contract was made in September, 1862. It should have been completed in March, 1863, but was not, and I presume it would not have been completed at that time, even, if no alterations had been required; but the modifications rendered it impossible to complete this work until eighteen or twenty months after the time of the contract. Supposing the vessels had been completed by the 1st of March, 1863, the following advances in prices would not have occurred to the contractors. In September, 1862, flange iron was six cents per pound; in March, 1863, it was eight and one fourth cents. In September, 1862, common iron was sixty-five dollars per ton; in March following it was $87 50 per ton—a very considerable advance. Now as to labor: finishers in September, 1862, were receiving eighteen cents per hour; in March, 1863, they were receiving twenty-one cents per hour—an advance of three cents per hour.

Because of the modifications required by the general inspector these vessels were not completed until the spring of 1864. Now, I ask Senators to observe the increased cost of material and labor running up to that period, and I will take the same items. Flange iron in September, 1862, was six cents per pound; in May, 1864, it was ten cents. Common iron in September, 1862, was sixty-five dollars per ton; in May, 1864, it was $145, being an advance of more than one hundred per cent. American iron in September, 1862, was twenty-six dollars per ton; in May, 1864, it was sixty dollars per ton, being an advance of more than one hundred per cent. With regard to labor, finishers in September, 1862, received eighteen cents per hour; in May, 1864, twenty-eight cents per hour. Laborers in September, 1862, received eleven cents per hour, and in May, 1864, twenty-one cents per hour, an advance of ten cents per hour, almost one hundred per cent. Smiths, in September, 1862, received nineteen cents per hour, and in May, 1864, thirty cents per hour. Carpenters in September, 1862, received eighteen cents, and in May, 1864, twenty-seven cents per hour.

Mr. President, I have referred to the cases of these three vessels for the purpose of illustration before the Senate. It is impossible for me to refer to each particular case that is provided for in this bill; but I give these three vessels for the reason that the allowance made by the board to Messrs. Secor & Co. upon these three vessels seemed to me to be as large as any in the list of the awards.

Mr. CLARK. With reference to that point I desire to say to the Senator that that is one of the great objections that I have to the bill, that the Senator and the Senate cannot consider each case separately by itself. I can conceive that there might be very good reason why we should make an allowance to A or to B on account of the action of the Government in delaying the work, when there would be no reason for making an allowance to C or to D.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will speak of that directly.

Mr. CLARK. The difficulty is, this bill takes the whole of them together, and we go rather by illustration of the whole case than by an examination of the individual cases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not exactly the case, for the reason that the committee, in the report made by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] have examined each claim and each case.

Mr. CLARK. That may be. The committee may have satisfied themselves, but the Senate may not be satisfied.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot say that the Senate will be satisfied, but the committee have not asked the Senate to take one or two cases as a matter of illustration. The committee, in their report, have given the particular facts of each claim. The report does not present these cases as a matter of illustration, but gives the facts in each case.

Mr. WILLEY. I merely rise to remind the Senator from Indiana that the bill also names each case separate and distinct, just as much so as if there were distinct and separate bills in each case. The committee not only report separately on each vessel, but the bill, although it provides for all of these claims in the same bill, does so by clauses, separating the claim of each.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that perfectly, because I have examined the bill somewhat; but here are forty-two cases, as the Senator will see, put in one bill, on which the Senate is to pass. We think it enough to pass upon one claim; but here we have got forty-two all in one bill.

Mr. WILLEY. Where is the difference whether we are to have forty-two bills, or have but one bill, when we can take up each case, or each vessel at a time, as we can do in considering this bill, framed as it is?

Mr. CLARK. That is not what we are doing. Senators are trying to carry the whole bill by an illustration of a portion of these cases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The committee do not propose to carry the whole bill by illustration, although in my argument I do not undertake to examine the particular merits of each particular case. The report of the committee, made by the Senator from Nevada, discusses each case separately, and presents the facts of each case as fully as the committee were able to do. But for myself, I content myself with giving a few illustrations, as the Senator from Iowa, the other day, selected one or two cases as an illustration, for the purpose of showing that some parties claimed largely, while other parties did not claim nearly so much.

Now, Mr. President, upon these three vessels, as I said, I thought the award of the board was as high perhaps as in any case, and I have selected them as being as hard a case to satisfy the judgment of the Senate upon as any. I have selected those three vessels, the Tecumseh, the Mahopac, and the Manhattan. The award upon each vessel is $119,000, making above $300,000 upon the three vessels. If it shall appear upon a careful examination of the allowance made upon those three vessels that it is right and proper, the Senate will not be so uncertain upon claims where the allowance is not so large.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I have not examined the report very carefully, but I find one case where the contractors claimed about seventy-seven thousand dollars, I think, and without showing upon what principle they had gone precisely, or without showing that he was not entitled to that sum, this board cut him down by a sort of arbitrary rule to the largest allowance they had made anybody else, to wit, about eighteen thousand dollars. They took another man's case as a guide for his, which showed to my mind that this board did not examine into the subject very carefully.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will speak of that directly. On these three vessels that I am speaking of $119,000 was allowed upon each. That seemed to be a large allowance, more than three hundred thousand dollars upon the three, upon a contract considerably above a million dollars, the entire cost of the vessels, including half a million of extra work which was ordered by the general inspector being above two million dollars. Now, upon work, the contract price of which is above a million dollars, the board allow above three hundred thousand dollars for losses sustained by the contractors. Upon an examination of the facts we see that labor has gone up nearly one hundred per cent. during the time that this work was carried on; some qualities of iron above one hundred per cent., and much of it approaching one hundred per cent.; so that when the contract was made, it was made with a view to the then prices, and the Government caused the delay of perhaps a full year by the change in the plan of the work, and during that period it went on advancing from month to month until this enormous price had to be paid for labor and material. I do not claim that it cost the contractors an additional hundred per cent. for their material and labor, for much of the work, of course, was done and much of the materials were purchased by the contractors before the labor and materials had reached this very high price; but I say that in view of the great increase of prices, this allowance did not seem to me to be extravagant.

The board do not seem to have examined these cases as an omnibus bill, but they examined each case, heard the evidence, and decided upon each case. Take the case that has been referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire; a party claimed $74,000 upon a contract of $82,000. The bureau of the Navy Department in its communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs has referred to that. It has not referred to the award made by the board, but has referred to the claim made by the party. My notion is, that it was not an honest claim; at least, it was not such a claim as ought to have been allowed, and it was not allowed. The board reduced it to $12,000. The Senator thought it was $18,000.

Mr. CLARK. I made a mistake.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In fact it was $18,000. I will explain to the Senator how he has been misled. The claim was for $74,000. The allowance is $18,000; but that allowance of $18,000 includes about $6,000 of extra work, which has been allowed by the Department, but has not been paid to the parties. The record shows that; so that the real allowance by the board for losses was $12,000 instead of $74,000.

Mr. CLARK. I said they had allowed $18,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They did allow $18,000, but $6,000 of that was for additional work required by the Department.

A word in regard to the Wateree, upon which the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] made a speech the other day. He says he has a personal knowledge of the Wateree and that it proved to be a defective vessel. I am not going to discuss with the Senator his information with regard to that vessel, nor his competency to judge of whether it was a well-built vessel or not. He is satisfied that the Wateree was not a well-built vessel. The Department does not agree with the Senator, although he thinks he got some of his information from the Department, but I think in part he must be mistaken, for the resolution which authorized the Secretary of the Navy to organize this board closed with this sentence:

"None but those that have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

The Secretary of the Navy had no right to refer any case to this board where the parties in the construction of the work had not given full satisfaction to the Department.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I deduced my conclusion with regard to the Wateree in part from the performance of the ship, which I presume is very good testimony in the case. Our sailing vessels make trips from New York to San Francisco in, say, one hundred and twenty days. They have been made within ninety days or thereabouts, and often within one hundred and one hundred and ten days. However, those are extraordinary trips. From one hundred and twenty or one hundred and twenty-five days to one hundred and forty days is a common trip for any good sailing vessel; but the Wateree, a steamship, a new ship, was I think more than eight months finding her way there. I only stated what came within my knowledge in that connection, and also in connection with that the statement made from the Department to me on the subject.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator from California will allow me to make a suggestion to him, the Monadnock is generally considered a good ship, and she was five months in getting to Rio Janeiro.

Mr. CONNESS. The Monadnock is a monitor, a ship of an entirely different class.

Mr. CLARK. A double-turreted monitor.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the Senator from California, I have to say simply this: that I am surprised that the Wateree ever got to California at all.

Mr. CONNESS. We were, too.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Anybody who is a judge of these vessels would be surprised; and the fact that she labored hard to get to California, going around South America, and it took her months to get there, is no evidence that she is not a good vessel; and the Senator would have so known if he had studied the structure of the vessel and the purpose for which that class of vessels was constructed. It is not a sea-going vessel. It was not intended to be. It is a double ender—a vessel constructed during the war, for the purpose of going into the rivers and creeks; and it is made a double-ender because it is likely to be used in rivers so narrow that they cannot turn. It is made with rudders and machinery, so that it can run either way. It belongs to the class of iron double-enders, and it is not at all a sea-going vessel. It was supposed to be necessary to have such a vessel on the California coast, and so, I suppose, the Department ran the risk of taking this vessel to sea around this very long voyage.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon for saying one word here. She was not sent to California to ascend any river.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I take that back. I do not want to discuss immaterial matters.

Mr. CONNESS. She was sent there for a sea-going vessel, a man-of-war, and is now on the South American station as such.

Mr. GRIMES. The only difficulty in getting these double-enders around the Pacific is, while they are in the Atlantic ocean. As the name indicates, the Pacific ocean is a pacific ocean, and these vessels, when they are once around Cape Horn, can perform good service in the ocean and on the ocean.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have you been on the Pacific?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; but I have read of the Pacific, as I suppose the Senator has.

Mr. CONNESS. What the Senator from Iowa says is true.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is pacific only in name.

Mr. GRIMES. There seems to be a contrariety of opinion here. The Senator from Maryland says that it is only pacific in name, and the Senator from California says my statement is true.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Maryland made one voyage.

Mr. JOHNSON. I made two.

Mr. GRIMES. At any rate, while they are not adapted to the navigation of the Atlantic ocean there are two or three of these vessels there—the Mohongo and the Wateree; and these vessels are found to be well adapted, I believe, to the service there.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am glad to hear that the Department has not made a mistake in sending these vessels around to the Pacific coast. I supposed they were intended for the same sort of service on the Pacific coast that I have been informed they were intended to perform on the Atlantic coast. I believe the Senator from Iowa, who is very familiar with this entire subject, agrees with me that they are not suited for the rough sea of the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will be kind enough to permit me to interrupt him one minute further, so as to give him my whole statement of the case. He will remember that I stated that upon the arrival of the Wateree on our coast she had to be taken into dock and a very heavy expense—I do not state the figures, for I have not got them, but those figures can be obtained at the Navy Department—a very heavy expense was entailed upon the Government by reason of the bad material used in her construction. That was the statement I made. That was the information I had from the Navy Department. I certainly did not, in what I undertook to say, intend to reflect on the vessel at all, but to state facts that had come within my knowledge.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend, I will state to the Senator from California, to give great weight to this particular case, and therefore I do not want to discuss it at great length. I will say a word or two in reply to him. The Wateree was not intended for sea service. She was put upon the ocean and taken around to California. It took her a long time to go there. It is a matter of surprise to me that she ever got there, as she was not intended for that sort of service. She gets there; she is bruised and battered during the voyage; and then is placed upon the stocks and is repaired at great expense.

Mr. CONNESS. I know the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator to conclude what he has to say on this subject, and then I will make a remark or two, and we will drop the subject of the Wateree.

Mr. CONNESS. I give the floor to the Senator. I do not desire to intrude upon him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator wish to say anything further?

Mr. CONNESS. As the Senator has called my statement in regard to the Wateree in question, I thought it would be acceptable to him for me to make myself understood on that subject. The Suwanee, subsequently sent to the Pacific coast, is a double-ender also, of the same class as the Wateree, and very nearly the same size. She went there in a great deal less time, performed better, and when she arrived there was in good order and condition. What I said strictly applied to the condition of the Wateree and her construction.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Suwanee was of the same class, manufactured by the same house, at the same yard, for the same price, I believe, and a little less was allowed for the loss on her by the board. She made her voyage to California in a little less time than the Wateree. That does not prove that the Wateree was not a good vessel. As I said before, I presume the Wateree had to encounter a sea which her construction and style did not fit her for, and when she got to California she had to be repaired. Senators know very well, and the Senator from California knows very well, the cost of repairing vessels in California. I believe that labor cost five dollars and $5 50 per day in gold at the Government works at Mare Island when gold was 250, making labor on that coast to cost, in the Government currency of the country, ten, twelve, or fourteen dollars a day; and of course it cost a great deal to repair a vessel there. I do not have it from the Department, and I do not know how true it is, but the gentleman told me that one of the vessels that was constructed in a Government yard was taken to California, and was so battered in the voyage that she was put upon the stocks at the Mare Island navy-yard, and it cost as much to repair her upon that side at the enormous rates paid there, as it would cost to build her upon this side. It may not be so. It cost a very considerable sum of money at any rate. There is no question about that, I presume.

Now, sir, we have the evidence of the Department in submitting the case of the Wateree to this naval board that they considered her satisfactory, for the resolution did not allow any claim to go before the board unless the work was done to the satisfaction of the Department. In the next place, we have a statement from the Department addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which the chairman of the committee read the other day, and there is no objection made to the Wateree, to her machinery, or to the style of her construction by that report that I now recollect. There is some objection made to another vessel, to some wood work on the Mohongo, but I believe no objection was made in that report or memoranda to any other vessel that is mentioned in this award.

Now, Mr. President, to conclude what I have to say on this subject, the Senate at the last session referred this whole subject to the Navy Department, and authorized the Secretary of the Navy to organize a board to estimate the amount of the losses that were sustained by these contractors. Was that right? Was it right for the Senate to contemplate the payment to these contractors of the losses that they necessarily sustained? As an original proposition, is it right? Is there any Senator here that desires to see these men broken up for work done for the Government during the war? On that subject I will read what is said in the report of the committee:

"The committee believe that in many other cases the completion of the work was delayed by the action of the Department, because it is the concurrent testimony of many of the contractors that such was the case, and also because it could not be otherwise, inasmuch as the art of building iron-clad ships-of-war was not then perfect; it was yet in experiment, so much so that constant modifications of the plans became necessary as the use of completed vessels discovered defects or suggested improvements. And it would have been a failure of duty on the part of the Department had it failed to introduce any improvement at any time during the progress of the work; and to the fact that diligence and care were observed in that regard is in part to be attributed the production of a navy so perfect and so formidable."

But suppose the Government had not interfered at all, and had not from time to time directed modifications of this work, which caused delay, and which threw upon the contractors the necessity of buying material and employing labor at greatly increased prices; suppose the contractors had made a mistake simply in regard to the cost of the work; and suppose that during the war they gave their entire energies to the production of a navy that astonished the world; are Senators willing that these enterprising citizens shall be broken up in such an enterprise? Was it a commendable thing that they undertook these contracts? Our navy-yards were fitted for the work of ordinary times, but they were not of sufficient capacity to produce a navy such as was required during this war. These citizens undertook the work. They have met with misfortune. Ought that misfortune to be borne by the people, or should these contractors be crushed in their patriotic enterprise? I admit, unquestionably, that the hope of making a profit may have influenced them to some extent; but upon that subject I will ask the attention of the Senate to the facts reported by the committee:

"From Messrs. Lenthall and Isherwood, of the Navy Department, and Mr. Wood, the general inspector, the committee learned that the petitioners entered into their contracts upon public competition, after general notice; that the lowest bid in a class was taken as a standard, which those bidding higher had to adopt, and that the prices were 'barely fair at the then current rates'; that the petitioners dealt fairly and honestly by the Government in procuring the very best material which they could command, and doing the best quality of work, and that they were diligent in adopting all measures in their power to complete the work within the stipulated time."

This evidence, as I recollect, was brought before the committee at the last session, and this is an extract incorporated into this report from the report that was made to the Senate at the last session of Congress. Then these contracts were made by these men at prices barely fair at the then current rates; barely fair in September, 1862, so far as many of the vessels are concerned. The prices from that time went on from day to day and from month to month advancing. These contracts were made by some below their own propositions, and at barely fair prices at the then current rates. Is there any Senator here who wishes to see these men broken up merely because they entered into contracts with the Government? Is there any Senator here who wishes to say to these men, "We have your bond, and we will hold you to your bond; we will take the blood out of your business; we will have the pound of flesh."

Mr. President, with this evidence before the Senate I cannot conceive it possible that Senators would desire to enforce a rule that between private individuals it is felt would be a hard rule to enforce. If a mechanic were to enter into a contract with any Senator here for the erection of a house, and it should afterward be proved that the material and labor cost much more than was expected, is there any Senator here who would be willing to take that house upon the bond and see the mechanic broken up? As between man and man, this would be regarded as a hard rule. Between the Government and the citizen who undertakes in a time of pressing need to produce that which the Government must have it is an oppressive and outrageous rule, in my judgment, that would hold him to his contract and his bond.

But, sir, the committee say further:

"The delays occasioned in the work by the changes of the plans caused large losses to the contractors; first, by leaving their labor unemployed for the time upon their hands; second, by requiring them to carry insurance and interest; third, by the constant and rapid increase of the cost of labor and materials, and the depreciation of the currency, for which the Department could not give adequate and complete relief. The delays worked a special hardship upon the builders of the nine vessels first mentioned, as it was provided in their contracts that they should each receive $500 per day for every day their vessels were completed before the time limited for their completion. From Mr. Wood, the present general inspector, the committee learned that this class of contractors, to overcome the delay occasioned by the changes in the plans and waiting for the specifications, and to meet the earnest requirement of the Department for an early completion of the vessels, prosecuted the work at night and on Sundays, and that for such work they were compelled to pay double prices, for which the Department did not and could not make them any compensation."

Again, they say:

"The committee are satisfied that the petitioners have sustained, and are sustaining, heavy losses, which it was not in their power to avoid after making their contracts. The contracts were generally for large amounts, and required a long time for their completion. It was impossible for them to make provision for all the material required, or to foresee and provide against the great advance in the price of labor. The demand for iron of peculiar and large sizes and fine quality was great, the supply small, and the means of producing it in the country limited. New machinery for preparing and rolling it was necessary; under such circumstances builders of iron ships and heavy machinery could not contract in advance for such quantities as would be required, even could they advance the money, so that they were compelled to abide the fortunes of the market. During the progress of the work, by many of the petitioners, labor and materials have advanced, perhaps, one hundred per cent. This was not foreseen either by the reckless or the most prudent. The increased cost of labor and materials outran the calculation of every one. Ought the losses resulting from such a state of facts to fall entirely upon the petitioners? The committee think not. First, for the reason that the Government, by her own competition for skilled labor and material, contributed materially to the losses. Second, the Government, by the mode and manner in which she imposed her taxes, contributed to the result."

I will not read further from the report, and will now leave this question, so far as I am concerned, with the Senate. When the cases of these contractors were presented to the committee, and referred to myself along with the distinguished gentlemen who were associated with me on the sub-committee, I gave the subject very close attention. I soon became interested in the examination, and during the progress of the examination I went to the navy-yard, and I saw one of these vessels, the Mahopac, a vessel that has cost the firm who built it $119,000 more than the Government has paid for it. That vessel has gone through the strife of the war. She was in the James river when her services were very important. She rendered very valuable service at Fort Fisher, and came out of it battered and bruised with the marks of the enemy's cannon balls upon her. And now, sir, as she lies at your navy-yard battered and bruised, here, having come out of the war, proving herself to be a first-class vessel, of great value in bringing the war to a close, is there any Senator willing to say to the enterprising firm who built her, "We have got your vessel; she has done us valuable service; she helped to take a most difficult point, Fort Fisher, where failure had occurred before; a point that had to be taken in order to stop the supplies of Richmond; she has helped to reduce Wilmington; she has contributed very largely to bringing this war to a close; but we will hold you to your contract, and you shall bear this loss of $119,000?"

As to the question that is raised, and the most plausible objection, and the most difficult to answer, that this is an omnibus bill, we cannot examine each case. The entire Senate is unable to do that. But at the last session, upon the motion of the Senator from Nevada, this question was referred to the Navy Department. Are you willing to risk a question of this sort with the Department that represents the Government? Are you distrustful of the Secretary of the Navy in the selection of a board? Who can best examine a question of this sort? You admit these men ought not to be broken up for work they have done during the progress of the war. You admit that the changes of the market ought not to fall upon them and crush them when the Government has received the benefit of their enterprise and investments. Then you say we ascertain what allowance ought to be made? At the last session the Senate said it was a safe thing to submit that question to the Navy Department, and you said to the Secretary of the Navy, "Select a board." You did not impose the duty of investigation upon the Secretary himself, but you said to him, "Select a board and ascertain how much these men have lost." Were not these men authorized to infer from that resolution that you intended to pay the losses that it was proved had been sustained? You said to the Secretary, "Organize your board, and submit these cases to the board, but do not submit any case where the work is not entirely satisfactory; but if a man has done his work well, if the vessel has proven to be a good vessel, submit it to the board, and let the board take the evidence and report to us how much the losses are." That is not an omnibus proposition, because each case went before the board upon its own separate merits. The board was organized in June, 1865, by the Secretary of the Navy. For what purpose? For the purpose of ascertaining, safely to the Government, fairly to the contractors, what was the amount of loss in each particular case. Is it not fair to infer that the Secretary of the Navy would select men that were qualified for that duty? I think he did select such men. Who are they? I disagree with the Senator from Iowa with regard to this board, as I understand it.

Here is Commodore Thomas O. Selfridge. I understand that before the war he was in charge of the navy-yard in California, and was supposed to be qualified for the very business of superintending the construction of vessels and the repair of machinery, and he is now, as I understand, in charge of the navy-yard at Philadelphia. Is it not fair to presume, then, that the learned Senator from Iowa is mistaken in his suggestion to the Senate that Commodore Selfridge was a competent man on board ship, but probably did not understand very much about machinery. The Government has found him peculiarly well qualified; and I understand that he was selected upon this board for the reason that during most of the time this work was being done and these contracts made Commodore Selfridge was in California and knew nothing about these contractors or their claims, and came as an entire stranger to them and went upon the board without any feeling, prejudice, or previously formed opinion. I submit to Senators, if Commodore Selfridge is fit to be at the head of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, is he not competent on a board to investigate the question whether a man has sustained a loss or not in the building of a ship?

The next member of the board is Chief Engineer Montgomery Fletcher. I understand that when these contracts were made and this work was done, he, too, was not here, but was at some distant point, I do not know where, but was entirely removed from any influence these contractors could bring to bear upon him. He was an engineer. He ranks, I believe, in the Navy, along with Isherwood, who is in the Department. I do not know that he is so competent and so skillful a man. I do not make any comparison of that sort; but I say his rank as a naval officer, I believe, is equal to that of the engineer in the Navy Department. He is an engineer in the Navy Department by his profession, and by his studies is well qualified to make these investigations.

Then there is Paymaster Eldredge. I understand that he was selected because of his skill as an accountant. These claims of course involved the examination of very elaborate accounts, and I understand they were thoroughly examined; and he is one of the most skillful accountants in the employ of the Navy Department, and because of his qualifications in that respect he was selected.

I believe that this was a very competent board. Is the Senate not willing to risk a board so organized, selected from the skilled men of the Department by the Secretary of the Navy, to make a particular investigation, safe to the Government, as I remarked, and just to the contractors? They sat for five months, from June till December, heard the evidence, examined the claims, examined the accounts, and made their award on the 23d day of December last. Can we not trust to an investigation of this sort? If Senators say that it is right to make up to these men their losses without any profit, can you have a better assurance that the right has been ascertained than you do have when a board so organized makes a report?

Now, sir, I think it is safe to rely on that report. The Senator from Iowa—and I say to the Senate that on a question of this sort we ought all of us to give very much weight to his suggestions, for he is very competent, very thoroughly informed on every question in relation to the Navy, and we all know that he brings to the investigation of any subject a most honest purpose, just, as he understands it, to the Government and to all the parties—thinks that the report of this board is not sufficiently reliable for Congress to make an appropriation upon. I am not quite able to agree with him on that point, but if he shall feel it to be his duty, as I understand he will, to propose an amendment limiting the amount of allowance to a percentage upon the contract price, I do not know that I shall seriously oppose it. If any of these parties shall find it impossible to live under that allowance, they can present their particular claims to Congress, if they choose to do so, hereafter. I submit the question with what I have said to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer as a substitute for the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several parties the awards made in their favor by the naval board organized under the resolution of the Senate adopted March 9, 1865, the awards being made under date of December 23, 1865, and reported to the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, The payments shall not in any case exceed twelve per cent. on the contract price, except in the case of the Camanche, in which case the award shall be paid in full.

Mr. NYE. I desire to get this question settled in some way. If the Senate wish to postpone the question so that it shall come up to-morrow at one o'clock, I will not object.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be observed that the amendment I have proposed as a substitute to the bill that came from the committee, is to allow to each one of the contractors named in the award made by the naval officers twelve per cent. of the amount of the contract. As I stated to the Senate the other day, when this subject was under consideration, I am as conscious as anybody can be that there is a great deal of equity in many, probably in all, of these cases. These men, as has been said by the Senator from Indiana, entered into contracts with the Government at a time when the necessities of the Government were very great. They necessarily extended through many months, and, in some instances, through one or two years. All the energies of these contractors were applied to the execution of their contracts, and all their wealth and the wealth of their friends, in many instances, was embarked in the execution of their contracts. In the mean time the Government, with whom the contract was made, levies a duty not contemplated by the contractors at the time the contracts were made, on many articles necessary for them to use in fulfilling their contracts. It also laid a direct tax on many things, and laid them three or four times on some things that it was necessary for them to use in order to fulfill their contracts. Then not only was there a call for the labor they had anticipated, and supposed they would be able to use in their yards, but there was a conscription ordered, and in addition to that, we passed a law declaring that all mechanics and artisans who were employed by the United States in the navy-yards should not be conscripted, while all the mechanics and artisans who were employed by these private contractors were subject to conscription; and hence, those who did not go voluntarily into the Army, in many instances, were induced to go into the Government navy-yards in order to avoid conscription.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were "drafted" not "conscribed," as we were told.

Mr. GRIMES. I will not stand on terms; the proper term may have been "drafted." Now, although there may not be any legal claim upon the Government in such cases as these, it seems to me that these contractors present a very strong case in equity. I think that if I enter into a contract with the Senator from Maryland to execute a piece of work, and he uses any means, having the power to do so, to enhance the price of the execution of that work, if I could not enjoin him from doing so, at least I could recover the excess that through his instrumentality I was compelled to pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless I had a right to do it.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a question of conscience at any rate, if it is not a question of law. Now, the amount that I have proposed is twelve per cent. Senators will observe by the table that is appended to the report of the committee that during the time that these contracts were being carried into execution, the enhancement in the prices of labor and material was greatly in excess of that amount, from seventy-five to one hundred per cent. I think. The difference between the proposition which I have proposed and the award of the board is the difference between about $1,100,000 and $2,230,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Twelve per cent. would give $1,100,000.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. It is a reduction of one half.

Mr. WADE. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendment be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair an amendment which I wish to make to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, or to the original bill, either. It is the amendment relating to Donald McKay.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in the case of Donald McKay, of Boston, Massachusetts, who built the Ashuelot and machinery, and Miles Greenwood, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who built the Tippecanoe, whose contracts have been completed to the satisfaction of the Department, and who were prevented from appearing before the naval board, shall be entitled to the same rate of compensation as is authorized to be paid to other parties building the same class of vessels and machinery; and such payment to be made to them out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, The evidence submitted for his examination fully establishes the right of said parties to compensation.

Mr. WADE. I move that these amendments be printed, and that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. NYE. I move to strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "fifteen" in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will go over with the rest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio moves that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendments be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON CANAL.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 190.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of bill S. No. 190, to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

The Secretary commenced to read the bill.

Mr. WADE. This bill has been up before; I suppose it is not necessary to read any more than the amendments reported by the committee since its recommitment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will proceed to consider the amendments reported.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was in line twenty-one of section one to strike out "hold and convey real estate and other property."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-four of section one, to insert "and" after "money."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-four of section one, to strike out "their" before "franchise," and insert "its."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all of the second section, after the enacting clause, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

That the said company is hereby authorized and empowered to survey, locate, lay out, and construct a canal and sewer between the Anacostia river, commonly known as the Eastern branch, from a point thereon near its junction with the Potomac river, to a point on the old canal near Virginia avenue, which passes through the city of Washington; thence in, by, along, and through said old canal to the western corporate limits of said city of Washington; and thence to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia. The said canal and sewer, when constructed, shall constitute and remain a depository and duct for the sewerage from the city of Washington, and from the property of the United States therein; and the proper corporate authorities of the city of Washington shall always have unrestricted and full power to determine where the sewers of said city shall connect with the said canal and sewer, and the manner in which said connection shall be made, so as the manner of making the connection shall not injure or impair the bank of said canal and sewer where the connection shall be made, nor shall the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company make any charge or receive any compensation for any connection of sewers. The canal and sewer shall be cut to the depth of ten feet below high tide as it usually rises; and shall be seventy feet wide at the water-line, with the usual slope to the banks; and shall at all times be kept in good and navigable repair, and all sediment or deposits collecting in the same from the city sewers or otherwise shall be kept cleaned out so that the tide may constantly flow through the same; and the said company shall have the exclusive right to assess and collect tolls upon said canal and also upon the wharves and docks of the same.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend this amendment of the committee in the forty-ninth line on page 4 by inserting after the word "connection" the words "or drainage;" so that the clause will read:

Nor shall the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company make any charge or receive any compensation for any connection or drainage of sewers.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. In line fifty-one I move to amend by inserting the word "low" before "water;" so as to make it read, "seventy feet wide at the low-water line."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line five, before the word "require," to insert "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six of section three, to strike out "that" and insert "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "places," in line eleven of section three, to strike out the words "as the board of directors may deem proper at such time."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen of section three, to strike out the words "or such amount thereof as said corporators shall deem sufficient to authorize said company to commence said work," and in lieu of them to insert:

And at least twenty per cent. of the whole capital stock shall be subscribed before the said company shall be authorized to commence said work.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the member from Ohio whether he ought not to provide in addition to the provision which he has that the stock shall be subscribed, that it shall be paid in.

Mr. WADE. There is a provision for that further on.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. While we are on this section of the bill I think "any," in line ten, before "place," had better be stricken out and the word "some" inserted; so that it will read:

Books for subscription to the stock of said company shall be opened at some place in the city of Washington.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The member from Ohio said that a provision was in the bill that twenty per cent. should be paid in, but that is not the provision; only ten per cent. is to be paid in.

Mr. WADE. At the time of subscription ten per cent. is to be paid in.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that is all they are under an obligation to pay before they begin the work. What I suggested was that before they began the work they should have twenty per cent. paid in.

Mr. CLARK. They cannot call a meeting until twenty per cent. has been paid, not even a meeting to organize. Look at page 7 and you will see "as soon as the aforesaid twenty per cent.," &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I think ought to be done—I do not see that it is done by any provision I have yet observed—is to require that they should pay twenty per cent. before they commence work.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will look to page 7 he will see.

Mr. WADE. It reads:

As soon as the aforesaid twenty per cent. on the whole capital stock shall have been subscribed as aforesaid, and the said cash payment of ten per cent. shall have been made, the said corporators, or a majority of them, shall call a meeting of the stockholders, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where is the provision that the other ten per cent. shall be paid in?

Mr. WADE. I did not say that there was a provision that the twenty per cent. shall be paid. Ten per cent. shall be paid; I supposed that was enough. It is a very large expense they are to be at.

Mr. JOHNSON. Twenty per cent. is a small proportion.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourth section of the bill after the enacting clause, and in lieu of it to insert:

That as soon as the aforesaid twenty per cent. on the whole capital stock shall have been subscribed as aforesaid, and the said cash payment of ten per cent. shall have been made, the said corporators, or a majority of them, shall call a meeting of the stockholders at the National Hotel, in the city of Washington, by advertisement in one or more of the daily newspapers printed in the city of Washington ten days previous to such meeting; and the said stockholders, in person or by proxy, shall proceed to the election from among the stockholders, by ballot, of seven directors for conducting and managing the business of said company for the term of one year from the time of their election. The said directors, so elected, shall immediately appoint one of their number to be president of the board of directors, and also another one of their number to be treasurer of said company. The said president, treasurer, and directors, before entering upon the discharge of their duties as such, shall respectively take an oath before any officer authorized to administer oaths, that they will support the Constitution of the United States, and will faithfully discharge the duties of their respective offices. In the absence of the president a majority of said directors may appoint a president pro tempore; and a majority of said directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section at this point:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said president, directors, and treasurer shall continue in office one year from the time of their election, and the directors shall fill any vacancy which may happen in their own body during the term for which they were elected, and in case of the death, resignation, or disqualification of the president or treasurer, they may elect a president or treasurer to serve for the residue of the term; and the stockholders, in one year after the day on which the election of directors shall be first made, and on the same day in every year thereafter, (excepting the same shall happen on Sunday, and in that case on the day succeeding,) shall elect by ballot a new board of seven directors from among the stockholders, from whom a president and treasurer shall be forthwith appointed to serve one year, all of whom shall, in manner and form aforesaid, take the oaths aforesaid; and the president and directors, for the time being, shall give public notice in one or more of the newspapers published in the city of Washington, at least ten days previous to the expiration of the time for which they were elected. Each stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for every share of stock held by him at the time; and any stockholder, by written authority under his hand, and executed in the presence of two witnesses, may depute any other stockholder to vote and act as proxy for him at any general meeting.

Mr. WILLEY. I think there should be an amendment in the seventeenth line. There was an omission of the printer or draughtsman. After the word "notice," in the seventeenth line, I move to insert the words "for a new election;" so that the clause will read, "and the president and directors, for the time being, shall give public notice for a new election in one or more of the newspapers published in the city of Washington, at least ten days previous to the expiration of the time for which they were elected."

Mr. WADE. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I think that the section had better be amended in line twenty-three. There is a provision that a stockholder may depute any other stockholder to vote for him by proxy. Why should he be confined to "any other stockholder?" Why not "any person?" It may be for his interest to select some one outside of the corporation when he cannot go himself. He should not be confined to a stockholder.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not usual with us to allow others than stockholders to act as proxies.

Mr. CLARK. It is with us.

Mr. WILLEY. In drafting the amendment I followed what was the usage as far as I was acquainted with the usage.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend by striking out the words "any other stockholder," and inserting "another person."

Mr. WILLEY. Simply add after "stockholder" the words "or other person;" that will be better.

Mr. WADE. Very well. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CLARK. I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia, and move to add "or other person."

Mr. SPRAGUE. That seems to me a very singular amendment. Here is a stockholders' meeting in which it is proposed to introduce outsiders. It is something quite new to me in the organization of companies. I have never known it to be done in any meeting I have attended.

Mr. CLARK. It is done oftentimes.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It ought not to be.

Mr. CLARK. This section is for the election of directors after the corporation is organized.

Mr. SPRAGUE. So much the worse.

Mr. CLARK. Here is a man the owner of stock; he is sick and unable to attend, and his son may be a very proper person for him to depute to go. Shall he not have the privilege? He knows about his business. Must he send his proxy to somebody else who is a member of the corporation?

Mr. WILLEY. He need not send his son; he might make another stockholder his proxy.

Mr. CLARK. But he may instruct his son as to what he wants to do. His son may be in such intimate relations that he chooses to have him vote for him. He cannot instruct him in everything that may come up. There is no harm in it certainly.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment, was to insert, after the section just inserted, the following:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the said company shall, before he acts as such, give bond to the company in such penalty, and with such security as the president and directors shall require, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties and trusts committed to him. The salaries of the officers of the said company shall be fixed by the board of directors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at this point:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the shares in said company shall be deemed personal and not real estate, and shall be transferable in such manner as the board of directors shall prescribe, and the shares held by any individual shall be liable to be attached or taken in execution by ieri facias to satisfy the debts due from any such individual, in like manner as other personal property may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, and their successors, shall have full power to demand and receive of the stockholders in equal proportion, the remaining four fifths of the shares of stock, from time to time, as they shall judge necessary; and if any of the stockholders shall neglect or refuse to pay their proportions within one month after the same shall have been required, the share or shares shall be forfeited: Provided, That notices shall be given by advertisement in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the city of Washington, for ten days, of the time when the same shall be required to be paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know from the committee the exact meaning of this section. What do they mean by "the remaining four fifths of the shares of stock?"

Mr. WILLEY. You will observe, by a preceding section, that they are required to pay twenty per cent., which is one fifth, on subscribing. Then in order to get the remaining four fifths this section provides that they shall pay it in the manner here prescribed.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it says "four fifths of the shares," not "four fifths of what is due on the shares."

Mr. CLARK. As I understand the section, it seems to me very objectionable indeed. As soon as twenty per cent. or one fifth of the stock is subscribed, this corporation may proceed, and ten per cent. is all that is to be paid in. Now, as I understand it, this provision is that the gentlemen who subscribe the one fifth in the first instance are to be liable to subscribe for the other four fifths by and by. That must be the clear meaning of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I supposed to be the meaning of it.

Mr. CLARK. It certainly should not be so. A man may be supposed in the first instance to take all the stock in the corporation he wants, and on that he is assessed ten per cent. But what is this section?

That the said president and directors, and their successors, shall have full power to demand and receive of the stockholders, in equal proportion, the remaining four fifths of the shares of stock.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rose for the purpose of inquiring whether that was the purpose. It requires any stockholder to take his proportion of the rest of the stock although he may not be willing to do it; and even if he was willing to do it, the effect of the provision is to secure the whole of this stock to the persons who first subscribe, and to compel them to take it. That is not the object, I suppose.

Mr. WADE. I do not understand it so.

Mr. CLARK. I supposed there was some misunderstanding in regard to it, for I certainly think the Senator from Ohio would not have reported such a provision.

Mr. WADE. I suppose if a man has subscribed for stock and paid in one fifth of it, if in one month after a demand is made upon him and he refuses to pay the balance he should forfeit the stock. Surely he cannot hold it forever. It is a very common provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is right enough.

Mr. WILLEY. The object of this section is very plain, but perhaps not well expressed. I move, in order to meet the objections of Senators, after the word "stock," in the fourth line, to insert "by them respectively subscribed."

Mr. CLARK. But I think that does not accomplish what the Senator from Ohio understands by this section. As I understand it, one fifth is to be subscribed, and one tenth or ten per cent. of that is to be paid in. Now, you want a provision that the other nine tenths which is to be paid shall be paid in on the stock subscribed.

Mr. WILLEY. That is the object of the section.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment which the Senator from West Virginia proposes would not accomplish that. I think, perhaps, he had better pass this by, and something can be framed to accomplish the purpose very readily.

Mr. JOHNSON. It had better be passed by for a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment will be laid by for the time being informally, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The next amendment was in section [six] ten, to strike out from line one to line eleven the following words:

Said company is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase, lease, receive, and hold real estate, and any other property which shall be deemed necessary for the use of said company; but all such real estate or other property, whether public or private, shall be acquired by purchase of the same upon terms to be agreed upon between said company and the owners of any property which said company may desire to lease or purchase for the purposes aforesaid; and in case the owners of such property cannot agree upon the terms of the sale thereof, or.

And in lieu of these words to insert:

The said company are hereby authorized and empowered to take, purchase, and hold for the purposes of this act, so much real estate and other property as shall be necessarily required for the proper construction of the canal and sewer aforesaid, and for the construction of all proper and convenient basins, locks, reservoirs, docks, and wharves, to be connected with said canal and sewer. And where the said company shall not be able to procure such real estate by purchase from the owner thereof, or the owner thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [six] ten, line thirty-eight, to strike out "and" and to insert:

But no such inquisition shall be had until after ten days' notice thereof has been served on the owner of the real estate so to be taken, when he resides in the District of Columbia, or by publication of notice in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the city of Washington for twenty days where such owner resides beyond the said District. When the owner is a feme covert, the notice shall be to her and her husband; when he is a minor, to his guardian; and when he is non compos mentis, to his committee, or the person having the charge of his estate. The.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines fifty-one, fifty-two, and fifty-three of section [six] ten, to strike out the words:

And in case there be good cause shown, said inquest may be set aside, and said chief justice shall direct another inquisition to be taken in the manner above described.

And in lieu of them to insert:

Where good cause is thus shown, the said chief justice shall set aside said inquest, and appoint another similar commission, who shall qualify in the same manner, and whose inquisition shall be taken, returned, filed, and confirmed, or set aside for good cause shown, in the same manner as the first inquisition was taken, returned, filed, and confirmed, or set aside. And such commission and inquisition shall be renewed as often as may be necessary until the inquisition made shall be confirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call the attention of the member from Ohio to what, perhaps, is a mistake in the designation of the chief justice. In the twenty-second and twenty-third lines of the section, on page 11, he is designated as "the chief justice of the United States district court for the District of Columbia." I think it should be chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADE. The supreme court of the District of Columbia it ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSON. The language here is "the district court," in the twenty-third line, on page 11.

Mr. WADE. That ought to be amended. It ought to be "supreme court of the District of Columbia," instead of "United States district court for the District of Columbia." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out all of section [ten] fourteen after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the said company shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, cause a constant stream of fresh water to be turned into and upon the said old canal, and to flow through the same from the western corporate limits of the city of Washington to the Anacostia river, and to continue so to flow until the 20th day of October next, in default whereof the said corporators of said company shall forfeit and be jointly and severally liable to pay to the United States the sum of $2,000, recoverable on motion made by the mayor of the city of Washington or any other person, after ten days' notice thereof duly served in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any other court having competent jurisdiction. And unless the said canal and sewer shall have been fully constructed and completed in the manner specified in the second section of this act, on or against the 1st day of June, 1867; or in case the said company shall thereafter fail to keep the said canal and sewer in good repair, or clear of all sediment and deposits as by said section it is required, for three consecutive months, the franchise hereby granted to said company shall be forfeited, and the rights and privileges hereby granted shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section after section [eleven] fifteen:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That in order to aid the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company in fulfilling the objects and requirements of this act, the use of that part of the Washington canal, and bridges crossing said canal, for the purposes aforesaid, between the junction of Virginia avenue and a point near the foot of Seventeenth street west, at the mouth of Tiber creek, and for the width of seventy feet, to be determined by a line drawn through the center of said canal or channel and extended therefrom on either side thirty-five feet, be, and the same are hereby, vested in the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company, to have and to hold the same for the use and benefit of the said company.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the amendment in the eighth line by striking out "seventy" and inserting "eighty-two," so as to make it read, "for the width of eighty-two feet." Seventy feet is exactly the width of the canal, leaving no chance for a tow-path or anything of the kind; eighty-two feet is what the committee agreed upon.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. It ought to be further amended so that they can build the canal and save rebuilding one bank, for which purpose I move to strike out the words "through the center of said canal or channel and extended therefrom on either side thirty-five feet" and insert "anywhere between the banks of said canal," so as to leave them to make it between the old banks where they please.

Mr. CLARK. I think you had better look into that.

Mr. WADE. I see no objection to this language, "to be determined by a line drawn anywhere between the banks of said canal," so that they can use one bank or the other. By the language as it is now, they might have to build up from a line drawn through the middle, so as to be compelled to make two banks when they could use one bank to an advantage.

Mr. WILLEY. The previous part of the bill requires the canal to be seventy feet wide at low-water line. This clause as it now stands requires thirty-five feet on each side, which would only be seventy feet wide. That would leave no room at all for making a tow-path. It ought to be wider, in order to give them the privilege of making a tow-path.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to strike out the words "through the center of said canal, or channel, and extended therefrom, on either side, thirty-five feet," and in lieu thereof to insert, "anywhere between the banks of said canal."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to that. I think he had better strike out a little more, "to be determined by a line drawn," because I do not think there is any force in the language as it is now. I would say, "for the width of eighty-two feet, to be taken anywhere between the banks of the said canal;" because possibly by a line drawn anywhere between, you might run it beyond the banks.

Mr. WADE. I believe it would mean the same thing, but perhaps that would be better expressed.

Mr. CLARK. I move so to amend the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at this point as a new section:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or deemed, in any manner or way, to injure or impair any public or private rights or interests, or in any manner to affect the same beyond the mere transfer of the rights of the United States to said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after section [twelve] eighteen the following as a new section:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall permit all public property belonging to the United States to pass through said canal and sewer free of all charge or toll; and the said company shall, from time to time, as may be required, lay before Congress a just and true account of their receipts and expenditures, with a statement of the clear profits thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I propose further to amend the bill by adding at the end of section eighteen "and that the same may be altered, amended, or repealed by Congress."

Mr. CLARK. Put it at the end of section twenty. I have drafted an amendment to strike out "and" in line two of section twenty, and add at the end of the section, "and shall be subject to alteration or repeal;" so that the section will read:

That this act shall be deemed a public act, shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, and shall be subject to alteration or repeal.

Mr. WILLEY. I accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I will now move to amend the amendment of the committee in section eight, line four, by striking out the words "the remaining four fifths of shares of stock" and inserting "and" in place thereof; so that it will read, "that the said president and directors, and their successors, shall have full power to demand and receive of the stockholders, in equal proportion, and from time to time as they shall judge necessary;" and then to insert after "necessary" the words "such sums as may remain unpaid on any shares of stock subscribed;" so that the clause will read:

That the said president and directors, and their successors, shall have full power to demand and receive of the stockholders, in equal proportion, and from time to time, as they shall judge necessary, such sums as may remain unpaid on any shares of stock.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to amend the second section, in line thirty-six, by striking out the words "or near" and inserting "its terminus in;" so that the clause will read:

And thence to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal at its terminus in Georgetown.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment which the Senate have adopted at the instance of the Senator from New Hampshire, in the eighth section, still leaves unprovided for, as I think, the manner in which the four fifths of the stock not subscribed at first shall be thereafter subscribed. If it is left without a provision of that sort the president and directors may by by-law make that provision. If they can give the right exclusively to the then subscribers they are not required to open the books again as I understand.

Mr. WADE. I suppose not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have some reason to believe that the stock will be very valuable, at least that is the impression of those who profess to have some knowledge on the subject. I have none of my own, of course; but if the stock is to be very valuable—

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to that being changed if it is thought necessary to change it. For myself I was looking much more to the public interest than I was to the private interest.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt about that. I only suggest to my friend from Ohio that perhaps it would be as well to provide that the books shall be opened again unless all the stock is taken at the beginning.

Mr. WADE. What amendment would the Senator propose to accomplish that?

Mr. WILLEY. Has the Senator from Maryland adverted to the provision in the third section, line fifteen, "and said books shall be kept open until the whole amount of said stock shall be subscribed?"

Mr. JOHNSON. That will do. I was only asking if there was a provision on the subject.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. CLARK. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 238, to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move an adjournment.

Mr. CLARK. I want to get up this bill and then I have no objection to an adjournment. I want the bill up to adjourn on it.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. It will take but a moment to do what I want; I desire to have some executive messages referred.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 16, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, to be referred to appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HILL introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to apportion Representatives according to the number of voters in the several States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF NEW YORK MILITIA.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill providing the means for the payment of the militia of the State of New York for their service in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CATHARINE WELSH.

Mr. COOK introduced a bill for the relief of Catharine Welsh; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECORDING OF DEEDS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill authorizing non-residents to have deeds recorded in the office of the clerk of the United States district and circuit courts, &c.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NIAGARA FALLS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. PAINE introduced a bill to provide for the transportation of vessels around the falls of Niagara; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill making a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the Hastings, Minnesota River, and Red River of the North railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NEBRASKA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a bill to provide for the creation of a penitentiary in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

REMOVAL OF SURVEYOR GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK also introduced a bill to remove the office of surveyor general of the States of Iowa and Wisconsin to Plattsmouth, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. JENCKES introduced the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution relating to the passage of a law making regulations for the mode of electing members of Congress.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is expedient for Congress to exercise the power granted in section four, article one, of the Constitution for making regulations concerning the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives by general statute, with a view to prevent the recurrence of contested-election cases in either House arising out of elections conducted under State laws; and also with a view of securing the election of members of Congress by loyal constituencies.

Resolved further, That as means toward the attainment of such results in the election of members of the House of Representatives, it is expedient to include among such rules and regulations in substance the following:

1. A registration of all the electors in each district having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature in the State in which such district is situated.

2. A provision that such elections shall be conducted independently of the State elections, under the direction of officers whose mode of appointment and whose duties shall be defined in such statute; and that such elections shall be held on the same day in each district in the United States.

3. A requirement that at such elections those registered electors only shall be permitted to vote who shall have proved in manner to be provided in the regulations, their constant and continuing loyalty to the Government of the United States.

4. Provisions prescribing the conditions upon which those who were excluded for disloyalty may be readmitted to their right of suffrage for members of Congress at such election at some future period.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee on reconstruction.

LIEUTENANT A. H. PEARL.

Mr. BUCKLAND introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Lieutenant A. H. Pearl; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRIBUTION OF STATE PAPERS.

Mr. HAYES introduced a joint resolution to authorize the distribution of a portion of the surplus copies of the American State Papers in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HAYES also introduced a joint resolution extending the privileges of the Library of Congress to certain officers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER next proceeded to call the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Ohio.

FRAUDULENT CLAIM AGENTS

Mr. HAYES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for punishing, by imprisonment or otherwise, any person who as agent or attorney shall collect from the Government money due to officers, soldiers, or sailors, or to their widows or orphans, for services in the Army or Navy, or for pensions or bounties, and who shall fraudulently convert the same to his own use; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HAYES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

Mr. PLANTS submitted a joint resolution of the State of Ohio relative to exemption from taxation; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

WIRZ TRIAL.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to have prepared for publication the proceedings of the trial of Henry Wirz, in which shall be embraced, as nearly as practicable in the language of the witnesses, a summary of the testimony given, and the decisions, findings, and sentence of the court, together with the address of the Judge Advocate and that made in defense of the prisoner.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTH CAROLINA UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a report of the Judge Advocate General, and such other information as may be of record on file in his Department, on the subject, which will show what are the facts in the case, and what steps have been taken to bring to justice and punishment the murderers of the following-named Union soldiers belonging to the first and second regiments of North Carolina loyal infantry, alleged to have been tried and executed by orders of the rebel Generals Pickett and Hoke, under the pretext of their being deserters from the Confederate service, namely: Jesse Sumner, Hardy Dougherty, Stephen Jones, David Jones, William Haddock, John Freeman, John Brock, Sergeant Joseph Fulcher, William D. Jones, Charles Cuthrell, — Kellum, Mitchell Busick, Louis Freeman, Joseph Haskett, William Irvine, Anos Aymett, Stephen H. Jones, and J. J. Brock.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICO.

Mr. McKEE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence with the French Government in regard to the withdrawal of its forces from Mexico, which may have been exchanged since the correspondence communicated to the House with the President's message of January 5, 1866; whether that correspondence has been published by the French Government among the official documents communicated to the French Chambers or not, and specially any correspondence in regard to any specific promise from the French Emperor to put a stop to his proceedings in our sister republic of Mexico and discontinue imperialism there.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. PAINE offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of providing by amendment of the rules, that when the House shall have under consideration a bill or resolution which shall have been returned by the President with his objections to the House in which it originated, neither the motion to lay on the table nor the motion to postpone indefinitely shall be in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I object, if objection is in order.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is introduced under the regular call of the States.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. PAINE and DAVIS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 41.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 44, noes 49.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 57, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Beaman, Bingham, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Davis, Defrees, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Raymond, Rogers, Rollins, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Whaley—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Deming, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Holmes, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Laffin, Lynch, McClure, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shullabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Warner, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Broomall, Chanler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Farquhar, Ferry, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Newell, Noell, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, and Wright—81.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The main question was then ordered, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM.

Mr. INGERSOLL offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is one of the paramount duties of all legislative bodies to lighten as much as possible the burdens upon the laboring classes and promote the general welfare: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law the eight-hour system, as it is called, as constituting a day's work in the District of Columbia, and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to the committee being allowed to report "at any time."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will strike that out.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by inserting six hours and a half instead of eight, if that is in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman includes himself among the laboring classes I will accept the amendment; if he does not I do not accept it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire whether the resolution embraces laborers in the employ of the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It includes everybody so far as this city is concerned.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. So far as the employes of the Government are concerned, the Committee on the Judiciary have agreed upon a report.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am aware of that. This resolution goes further than the one that is before that committee. It proposes to establish the system by law for the laboring classes in this District.

The SPEAKER. If it gives rise to debate it goes over.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire whether if they work nine hours there is any penalty.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not yet. I demand the previous question.

The question being put on seconding the demand for the previous question, no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. McCULLOUGH and INGERSOLL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not propose to withdraw it. I move a call of the House. I want a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. There is evidently a quorum present.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You cannot prove it by me. [Laughter.] I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The call of the House was refused.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the Chair count the House so as to ascertain if there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER counted the House and announced that there were one hundred and eleven members present.

Mr. BOYER. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. That cannot interrupt the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the tellers will be required to resume their places.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution of my colleague upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I make that motion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and DEMING were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 92, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jencks, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Price, Shanklin, and Stevens—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Burt, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, McKee, Miller, Morris, McClure, McCullough, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry

D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Coffroth, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, Morrill, Newell, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rousseau, Sawyer, Shullabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Winfield, and Wright—76.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. LONGYEAR said: Mr. DRIGGS is absent in consequence of illness.

Mr. HOGAN said: My colleague, Mr. NOELL, is absent in consequence of sickness. I presume he would vote "no" if here.

Mr. ELDRIDGE said: I desire to say that Mr. LE BLOND is paired for two weeks with Mr. CULLOM.

Mr. SHANKLIN said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. TRIMBLE, is paired for two weeks from Friday last with Mr. ALLEY, of Massachusetts.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

The SPEAKER stated that the morning hour having expired, the resolution would go over until next Monday.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF LIQUORS IN THE CAPITOL.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration, as the first business on the Speaker's table, of the amendments of the House, disagreed to by the Senate, to the concurrent resolution, prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other liquors in the Capitol building and grounds.

The action of the Senate on said amendments was read, as follows:

IN SENATE, April 13, 1866.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the foregoing resolution.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the House insist on its amendments and ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and on that motion I move the previous question, as there are a large number of gentlemen here who have business to bring forward.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his demand for the previous question until I can make a single suggestion.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I must decline to do so as there are many gentlemen here who have business to present.

The previous question was seconded.

Upon ordering the main question there were upon a division—ayes 51, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WENTWORTH and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-three, noes not counted.

So the main question was ordered.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. WENTWORTH that the House insist upon its amendments to the concurrent resolution, and ask for a committee of conference; and being taken, it was agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Messrs. WENTWORTH, PRICE, and RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of Charles Youly;

An act (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Willcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Mrs. Isabella Fogg, of the State of Maine;

An act (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore;

An act (H. R. No. 268) for the relief of Albert Nevins;

An act (H. R. No. 443) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth York, widow of Shubal York, late a surgeon in the fifty-fourth regiment Illinois infantry volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 444) granting a pension to Lewis W. Dietrich; and

An act (H. R. No. 446) for the relief of Nicholas Hibner, late a private in the sixth regiment Missouri State militia.

WASHINGTON DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for action at this time:

Whereas it is important that our legations abroad should be kept truly advised of the state of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House, (the Senate concurring,) That the Clerk of the House be directed to furnish three copies of the Morning Chronicle to each of our foreign legations, consular agents, and commercial agents, for the use of said legations and attachés, and that he pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to submit this resolution at this time.

Mr. ROSS. I call the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is this: that a transaction of this kind, appropriating the contingent fund of the House to a purpose entirely outside of the organization and duties of the House, is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. In the appropriation bills there is a sum set apart for the contingent expenses of the House. It is for the House to determine by their votes how that contingent fund shall be distributed, not for the Chair.

Mr. HALE. My point of order is that the House can only appropriate that fund to expenses which properly pertain to the duties and business of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of argument and goes to the votes of the members of the House. It is not for the Chair to decide.

Mr. STEVENS. This is for the business of the House. There is an attempt made in some quarter to smother up in the country a knowledge of what the House is doing; and this is for the purpose of giving publicity to the business of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order: that this makes an appropriation, and should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Appropriation bills must go to the Committee of the Whole. This is not an appropriation bill, but merely a resolution directing the distribution of a portion of a fund already appropriated.

The question was upon suspending the rules. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 44, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bissell, Boutwell, Brownell, Bundy, Reider, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, Marcen, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, Schenck, Seofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Chanler, Coffroth, Davis, Defrees, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, McCullough, McKuer, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stillwell, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Whaley—44.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Broomall, Conkling, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Newell, Noel, Patterson, Pike, Platts, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Winfield, and Wright—79.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

PAY OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. ROGERS, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey asking an increase of the pay of naval officers; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. BOUTWELL. From the joint committee on reconstruction, I report additional testimony relative to the States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Arkansas. I move that of this testimony there be printed the same number of copies as of the testimony previously reported.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

PORTAGE AND SUPERIOR RAILROAD.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, instructing the Senators and Representatives from that State to use their endeavors to procure the necessary legislation to change the route of the land-grant road from Portage to Superior; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the construction of the Portage and Superior railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, asked leave of absence for Mr. GRINNELL for one week.

Leave was granted.

Mr. SHANKLIN, by unanimous consent, asked leave of absence for Mr. TRIMBLE until next Friday week.

Leave was granted.

CONFISCATION OF LANDS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any and what action is necessary to confiscate the titles to lands which were purchased by the late confederate States, and used for prison camps and other purposes.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHALEY (having obtained unanimous consent to make a personal explanation) said: Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that for the first time since I took my seat on this floor, in July, 1861, I have found it due to myself and my friends to rise to make a personal explanation. I wish to call the attention of the House to an article from the Cincinnati Gazette of April 7. I ask the Clerk to read that article, in connection with the heading of the paper, so as to show distinctly what it is.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Cincinnati Daily Gazette. Office, Gazette Building, northeast corner of Fourth and Vine streets. Saturday, April 7, 1866.

"A very laughable incident occurred last week in Congress. An account, submitted by the Committee on Agriculture, contained a large number of expenditures charged to various members of the committee, closing with considerable charged up to et al. Mr. HUBBARD objected, and said he did not know who 'Mr. Et Al' was, but supposed he was some friend of the Commissioner of Agriculture, or of the committee from West Virginia, Mr. WHALEY. This sally 'brought down' the House in roars of laughter, and sorely disturbed WHALEY, who begged the floor for an explanation. He is a rather ignorant man, and took the matter seriously, and therefore protested that 'Mr. Et Al' was none of his appointments; as he had recommended only soldiers or their families. The effect upon the House may be imagined."

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHALEY. I will.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to say that that mistake was brought about to some extent through my agency. When the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD] spoke of et al., I supposed that it was the name of a man. I called the attention of my friend from West Virginia to the matter, and asked whether that man was one of his appointees. In doing so, I was in error. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the reporters who have seats here in this House are either employed and paid by the House, or assigned to places in the reporters' gallery by the consent and order of the House. I believe indirectly they have seats assigned to them by the Speaker. Let me say the able reporter for the Gazette, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, has been gone from this city for four months. I have known him for many years, and I have regarded him as an excellent gentleman and an able correspondent. His successor, H. V. N. Boynton, is a son of the Chaplain of this House. Every member of this House must willingly confess that we have all profited by the pious prayers of our Chaplain; but when his son, occupying a seat by the courtesy of the House, sends forth an article so unkind, so ungenerous, so unfair, and so unjust, against me as a member of the House, it is a duty I owe to myself and to my friends to set the matter right here and before the country.

I appeal to the old members that no personal attack could be made upon me because of any personal misconduct on my part. I feel assured all will agree I have done my duty. Members with whom I have associated know that I have been uniformly courteous in debate, that I have been kind by nature; therefore the attack upon me must be ascribed to some political motive, and to nothing else. Now, I deserved better treatment at the hands of the Union men of Ohio. When the rebellion was powerful, with others I made an effort and succeeded in throwing up a barrier which saved the border counties of Ohio from the pillage and ravages of the hordes of secession. I have only done my duty in so doing, but it deserved some better return than this malicious attack.

I will say, in conclusion, that it has grown too common for correspondents who have been assigned seats here to slander members of Congress. I do not fear them where I am known. My associates know I have done my full duty. Who will deny my earnest effort to discharge my duty to the country when contemptible rebels attempted to destroy it? During the death-struggle I was the uncompromising enemy of the rebels and the contemptible doctrine of secession. And what I have done I have done to the best of my ability; no one could do any more.

I thank the House for its attention.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED.

Mr. HOLMES moved that leave of absence be granted to his colleague, Mr. HOTCHKISS. The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for three minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the New York Times.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"BANKRUPT BILLS.—The statement in the correspondence of the Herald that Mr. CONKLING, of New York, had, upon the defeat of Mr. JENCKES's bankrupt bill, introduced another 'which cannot be picked to pieces,' and which is as near perfect as the legal acumen of the first lawyers in Congress can make it, does Mr. JENCKES gross injustice, inasmuch as the bill in question is a verbatim copy of the one introduced and advocated by Mr. JENCKES, and which was bitterly opposed by Mr. CONKLING. He now takes Mr. JENCKES's bill and introduces it as his own."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my object in rising is to set the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] right in regard to this transaction. The offering of a new bill by him was more at my suggestion than perhaps at that of any other person. I consulted with the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] after his bill was defeated, in order that he might get up another bill before the House. He proposed to me I should offer the bill, but, as I was on the weaker side of the House, I thought it best not to do so. I went to the gentleman from New York and asked him to offer a bill of the same character to be referred and amended in such manner as to meet the objections which had been stated in the debate by some gentlemen who were disposed to vote for such a measure. It was manifest to me a bill drawn with different machinery would meet the views of gentlemen on the other side who refused to vote for the bill which had been pending. It was through no discourtesy to the gentleman from Rhode Island that it was proposed to submit another bill to be referred to the committee. He suggested, in the first place, I should offer the bill, and, as I have said, I induced the gentleman from New York to offer it. I went to him as he was known as an able lawyer and had taken an interest in the matter.

I make this explanation, not for the purpose of relieving myself from responsibility, for I am not ashamed of my vote for the bill. I have considered the subject, and think a bankrupt law necessary. So does the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] And it was a mere matter of courtesy, and nothing else, toward myself and other members who urged him to offer the bill, that he did offer it, not intending in any way to take away any of the prestige which belonged to the gentleman who introduced the bill. And when the bill is returned the chairman of the present committee will have control of it the same as before.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would inquire if we have the gentleman for an ally on this bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state he has always given information to gentlemen in regard to parliamentary questions when they have asked it, as is his duty, and that after the rejection of the bankrupt bill the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] and some other gentlemen, asked him how it could again be brought up, and the Chair stated that the committee would be revived by the introduction of a new bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the regular order proceeds I beg to express my obligations to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] for making this statement. An act of justice or of public courtesy from a political opponent is always rather a refreshing episode in the monotony and asperities of politics, and none the less so when induced by the malice of those who do not hold themselves as open adversaries.

As I am on my feet I will add that I have satisfied myself that the somewhat malicious, and indeed venomous, paragraph from the New York Times which has been read, was not originated and telegraphed to that paper by its avowed or ostensible Washington correspondent. From an acquaintance of some length with one of those correspondents I should be surprised had he thus defamed any member of this House. And I am glad, as attention has been called to the matter, to be able, speaking upon my belief, to exonerate the regular Washington correspondents of the Times from all part in originating the groundless imputation which the House has heard read.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] allow me simply to say that I believe the fact to be as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] and confirmed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING?]? When the act was done I happened to be absent from the House, and the gentleman explained to me immediately afterward the reason why it was done, for which he then received my thanks and now does.

I never saw this paragraph until this morning. I had no connection whatever with it, either with the originating or the publishing of it.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise neither to make a disclaimer nor an admission. I rise simply in consequence of the somewhat peculiar language which my colleague saw fit to apply to a paragraph which he says was in the New York Times. This is the first time, so far as I know, that that paper has been brought into this controversy. The paragraph read at the Clerk's desk was, as I understood, from another paper.

The gentleman says that a paragraph somewhat peculiar and venomous in language appeared in the New York Times, and he acquitted two gentlemen of the responsibility for that paragraph. Whether these gentlemen are obliged to him for his volunteer acquittal is their concern, not mine. I did not know but that from some peculiarity in the gentleman's manner and emphasis he meant to throw the responsibility of what he styled the peculiar venom of the paragraph upon me as the known editor of that paper. When he will be more plain and explicit upon that point, I shall be glad to make such an answer as the case will permit.

Mr. CONKLING. I will make what I say explicit. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] whether I am right in stating that the paragraph just read at the Clerk's desk was read from the New York Times.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; from the Times of April 13.

Mr. CONKLING. That is explicit as to that. Repeating that I believe the regular correspondents are blameless, I now ask my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] if he sees or feels anything in the matter as it stands before the House which calls upon him to admit or to deny having telegraphed or inspired a libel upon one of his colleagues. If he did it, I do not know the fact, but I repeat that I have reason to believe that neither of the ordinary correspondents of his paper did it. I believe I have been sufficiently explicit now for the present.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not feel disposed to disclaim or admit anything on the strength of such an appeal as the gentleman has seen fit to make; merely upon the strength of that appeal I shall not admit or disclaim anything to him in this matter. I had not seen this paragraph or heard it read until this moment. I supposed when it was read from the Clerk's desk that it was from the New York Herald, as that was the name of the paper I understood the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] to mention. I paid very little attention to it. If I can see the paper, of course if there is anything to be said about it, I am ready to say it here or elsewhere.

All that I know about the matter is that I was informed immediately after the gentleman introduced the bill, by another gentleman who was more concerned in the bill than he himself was or than I was, that after killing that bill he had reintroduced it in precisely the same form. I presume I repeated that fact to several persons. I do not remember whether I repeated it to any correspondent of my own newspaper or of any other. I understood that to be the fact;

I repeated nothing more than that fact, and I had it from authority which my colleague would not question or dispute for a moment. If there was anything "venomous" in that act I suppose he is welcome to the circumstance. I can only say that I never had any feeling against him in regard to that matter or any other. I have never expressed it in correspondence, or, so far as I am aware, in conversation. As the paragraph is not before me I do not feel called upon to say anything more on the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. If the House will indulge me, I wish to make for myself an emphatic disclaimer. My colleague does not like to disclaim anything. I wish to disclaim making any appeal whatever to him upon this question. He iterates and reiterates the word "appeal;" I remind him that I have made no appeal to him; and if he feels called upon to say anything touching his own connection with this matter it must be in consequence of promptings other than any suggestions of mine.

One word further, Mr. Speaker. The bill which I introduced was sent me, it seems, by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] at the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] and others of the select committee. I did not look at it but simply complied with the request made of me, not only by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] but, in substance, by several other members of the select committee. A number of gentlemen appealed to me to do something to revive the bill, that it might be further amended. This I was willing to do upon receiving the assurance that the committee would accept certain amendments. The chairman of the committee supposed a motion to reconsider would accomplish the purpose, and to satisfy him upon this point I put a question to the Chair which drew from the Speaker the statement that the only way to keep alive the committee, and repossess it of the subject, was to introduce a bill anew and have it referred. This I expressed my willingness to do with the understanding that it should be rendered acceptable to those who thought with me as to alterations to be made. This understanding was assented to by at least three members of the committee, and some one of them was to bring the bill to my seat. It was brought to me as I have said, and without looking at it at all to see whether it was one man's bill or another man's bill, I sent it to the Clerk's desk and asked leave of the House to introduce it. The leave being granted, I suggested to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] that it might be well to ask the Speaker to recognize him, that he might enter a motion to reconsider, so as to be able to call up the motion and the bill at his pleasure, as his committee might not soon be called for reports. My whole purpose was, as will be seen, to do my utmost to aid the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] and his committee, and to give them absolute control of the subject.

This act of courtesy, so ordinary that I think no member of the House would claim credit for having done it, or would have felt himself excused had he refused to do it when requested, has been seized on by some one and perverted into a dishonorable proceeding. A telegraph has been sent to one of the great papers which is malicious and venomous. The venom is easily discoverable, and particularly in the statement that Mr. CONKLING having bitterly opposed the bill, now takes it and introduces it as his own. Does not every man of honor see the animus of that? Did not every reader of the paper see in it an accusation that the person referred to had been paltering in a double sense; that he had bitterly opposed a measure and had then sought to claim it as his own; that he had appropriated another man's labor, had sought to deprive another of his just dues, and had attempted to palm off as original something not his own?

All this of false suggestions, and more, is contained in this telegraphed libel.

I repeat that it was an extraordinary statement, a venomous statement, and I stand by what I say. I also repeat my belief that the gentlemen who ordinarily telegraph to the New York Times, and whom the public hold responsible for what appears there as "telegraphic dispatches from Washington," did neither of them either inspire or write this dispatch. There, if others are content to leave it, I am content to leave it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am not quite content to leave it just there. The remarks about appealing to me now to disclaim related to the manner rather than to the fact. The gentleman did not see fit, in any way which I thought I could with propriety notice, to say or intimate that I was responsible for that paragraph. The only reason that I alluded to it at all was because of some intimation in his manner and tone that he, perhaps, looked on me as responsible for the paragraph. That was the reason I declined to explain or make any explanation on that particular point. I think now he has made the matter of his own feeling in this case a little more manifest than it was at first. And I beg now to say, as I said before, that I am in no sense responsible for that paragraph, except that in conversation with others I may possibly have made myself responsible for the facts stated in it, namely, that the gentleman, having opposed the bill before the House at that time, and contributed to its defeat, immediately reintroduced the same bill. That is a fact that he himself admits. And in the absence of any explanation on his part, I beg leave to say to him that it gives rise to a certain construction which may or not be venomous, but is certainly not complimentary to the one that does it. Now, I put no such construction upon it; but I take the liberty of saying here that I know others did place that construction upon it.

The explanation of the gentleman of the way in which the bill was reintroduced and the motives that led him to reintroduce it is perfectly satisfactory to all persons, I suppose, as it seemed to be to the gentleman who was the author of this bill, [Mr. JENCKES.] With that explanation the matter is clear now; without it I submit to him that it was not clear before.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the gentleman know that the bill that was reintroduced was the identical bill reported from the committee?

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know that fact. But, as I said before, I was assured by a member that it was the same bill verbatim, et literatim, et punctuatim.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know how the fact is, either. And I repeat that the bill was sent or brought to me by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] as it turns out, or rather I think two bills were brought to me, one of which I sent to the Clerk's desk, and the other I returned, without looking into either.

Mr. RAYMOND. With that explanation, as I said before, it is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a detailed statement of the expenditures of the contingent fund of that Department for the year ending June 30, 1865, agreeably to the act of Congress of August 26, 1842; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 184) entitled "An act to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue cutters."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 25) entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Hurley."

The message also communicated the following extract from the Journal of the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 16, 1866.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate a bill of the House (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell, which was postponed indefinitely on the 13th instant.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back, with certain amendments, a bill (S. No. 20) entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," and moved that the same be recommitted, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Agreeably to order, the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. HALE, to insert after the word "lieutenants," in the twelfth line of the third section, the following:

And that after the original vacancies are filled, enlisted men of the regular Army who shall have served at least six months shall in like manner be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] the propriety of inserting in his amendment the words "one year" instead of "six months," in order to prevent an abuse, by which men without proper claims may be enlisted for the very purpose of getting commissions, an abuse which has prevailed to some extent, and for which a door ought not to be opened.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection to that. I modify my amendment in that way.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, which I think will improve his amendment, and will, I believe, meet his approval. My proposition is that enlisted men should be eligible to second lieutenantcies after one year's service, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, in the regiments in which they are serving; and not in other regiments. The language of the amendment as it now stands would allow an enlisted man of one regiment to be enlisted in another.

Mr. HALE. I do not see the objection to allowing these men to be transferred. I understand that this corresponds with the ordinary practice of the Department. It is deemed better, I believe, that when appointments are made the appointees should be transferred to new regiments in which they have not served.

Mr. PAINE. With regard to the general rule the gentleman is right, but if he will consider the effect of that rule as applied to this case he will see that it ought not to be adopted.

Now, there are six new regiments of cavalry for which we are now providing; but there are in the Army fifty-five regiments of infantry and six regiments of artillery, in addition to twelve regiments of cavalry. Now, the rule which he proposes will allow enlisted men from all those regiments to be commissioned in these six new regiments of cavalry. It will be observed that it is only in these six new regiments of cavalry that the most desirable vacancies can be found in the Army. The six regiments of artillery are already full or are provided for; the six old regiments of cavalry are already full or are provided for. It is only in these six new regiments that there will be vacancies; and if we allow enlisted men of the Army, who have served as volunteers during this war, to be transferred from any one of these eighty regiments into these six regiments, but a very small chance, it seems to me, will be left for volunteers who have served either as enlisted men or as officers during the war and have by such meritorious service earned the right to commissions in these regiments.

I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the words "in the regiments in which they shall have served."

Mr. HALE. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] should not be adopted. I understand that it has ordinarily been found the true policy, in making appointments from the rank and file of the Army, to transfer the appointees to regiments in which they have not served; for the simple reason that one who has served as a private is less likely to exercise the proper discipline and control among men with whom he has been familiar as a companion and an equal than among strangers.

I do not think that the gentleman from Wisconsin has any good reason to fear that these regiments will be filled up from the rank and file of the whole Army. I am not aware that the War Department in appointments or commissions has ever manifested any such favoritism on behalf of the rank and file of the Army as to lead to the belief that there will be an abuse of power in this respect hereafter. I think there is no reason to apprehend these regiments will be unduly flooded by appointments from the rank and file. This same provision is to be made, of course, in regard to the infantry regiments, and it seems to me they ought to be left on an equality.

The question recurred on Mr. PAINE's amendment to the amendment.

The House was divided, and there were—ayes nine, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. HALE's amendment.

Mr. PAINE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to insert after the words "shall be eligible" the words "without having served as volunteers."

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I will assign as briefly as I can my reasons for moving the reconsideration of that amendment. It was an amendment which was adopted to come in the eleventh line of the third section, after the word "eligible," so as to make the section read:

That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible, without having served as volunteers, to appointment as second lieutenants.

I am more than ever satisfied that the bill as originally reported was very much nearer right than it will be with any such amendment. That amendment, if it have any effect at all, at least does not carry out the intention of the section in that clause, nor avoid the evil intended to be guarded against. As provided now by the section, two thirds of the officers above the grade of first lieutenant are to be selected from the volunteers, and all the subalterns, that is, the first and second lieutenants, from the volunteers. The proviso was put in to save the graduates of West Point, the object being to enable the young men who have been educated there to come in, notwithstanding this third section allows only volunteers in these subordinate appointments. Without that provision they will be excluded.

Now, if we put in these words, if graduates may come in without having served as volunteers, it can only have some such effect as this: none of the graduates who are yet to come from West Point have served either in the volunteers or the regular Army, and it must be intended to cover graduates who have been sent out from that Academy in former years. Now, every graduate of West Point living during this war either served in the volunteers, or in the regular Army, or did not serve at all. If he has served in the volunteers he is provided for as a volunteer officer. If he served in the regular Army he does not want a place as second lieutenant, because he has a place already. If he did not serve at all he has no business in any Army of the United States. If any man having the advantage of a military education such as that given at West Point could go through this war indifferent, not seeking employment on the part of the country, he ought not to be permitted to come into the Army after the war is over. That is my doctrine, sir, and I would enforce it.

Mr. CHANLER. Let me say—

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not want to be interrupted, and I am never able to hear what the gentleman says even if I were to yield to him.

If the section is permitted to stand with the proposed amendment, which I assented to, but which on reflection I believe to be all wrong, if graduates come in as volunteers, it throws open the door for those graduates who have been in the rebel army. No one, I presume, intended that, yet it has that effect. Or its effect will be to throw open the door to those who have been in no army, but resigned perhaps from our Army when the war broke out because they did not want to be in during the war, and are willing to return in the position of second lieutenant when all danger has gone by. We do not want them to be admitted.

I ask, therefore, that the amendment by which these words were introduced shall be reconsidered. If anything be done with that class I prefer to fall back upon what was agreed between my colleague and myself, that hereafter a graduate of West Point shall be eligible to a second lieutenantcy, the object of the committee being to save these educated young gentlemen and not exclude them from appointments by giving all these subaltern positions to volunteers. It will carry out, too, the intention of the committee to provide two thirds above first lieutenants shall be volunteers, and that all the first and second lieutenants shall be volunteers except these graduates from West Point who shall be eligible to come in as second lieutenants.

I ask the House, therefore, to reconsider the vote by which the first amendment was adopted; and I give notice that if that motion shall prevail then I shall propose, or my colleague on the committee [Mr. BLAINE] will propose, to amend the provision.

Mr. BLAINE. I will send to the Clerk's desk the amendment I propose. I understood on Friday last, when I yielded to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] that that amendment of the gentleman from New York was to constitute a part, and not to take the place of my amendment. Under that misapprehension I yielded, which I should not otherwise have done.

Mr. BLAINE's amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, however, That cadets hereafter graduating from the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointments as second lieutenants.

Mr. CONKLING. I came into the Hall in time to hear the amendment read, and I take the liberty at this moment, to suggest to the Committee on Military Affairs that the amendment which has been adopted will be as necessary and applicable in case the motion to reconsider should prevail as otherwise, because when you say those who graduate hereafter shall be eligible, you do not provide, unless you express it in terms, that they shall be eligible without previous service.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from New York being absent, he failed to hear the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish to say further, that when I yielded on Friday to the gentleman from New York, it was on the understanding that his amendment should be incorporated with mine, not thinking that it would be put simply in place of mine. That gave rise to an evil which the chairman of the committee has just explained.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the House will not vote in here anything as harmless surplusage. This amendment is not mine in any sense. It was a mere suggestion which would reach the object which the gentleman from Pennsylvania sought to accomplish. But I am quite sure that it is not harmless surplusage. If the committee intend that graduates from West Point shall not be eligible unless they have served as volunteers, I am not prepared to say that it is not right.

Mr. SCHENCK. The objection I make, on reflection, is that it is all wrong to appoint a graduate from West Point who, during the war, has not been in service.

Mr. CONKLING. I appreciate that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. If he has served in the rebel army he ought not to be appointed. If he has served in the Union Army he is provided for. If, with his military education, he has not served at all, more shame for him.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree that there is great force in that, and I have no opinion to express against it. I only say that if, in opposition to that view, the intention was to render eligible cadets without service, then the amendment suggested was necessary. In that view the amendment was not surplusage; otherwise it amounts to nothing.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the gentleman from New York misapprehends the point of the amendment. The bill confined the appointments to the subaltern grades, first and second lieutenantcies, to volunteers, and without a proviso letting in West Point graduates they could not get in. Being confined by the letter of the bill to volunteers, a proviso was put in saving the chances of the West Point graduates. The proviso now pending is:

Provided, That cadets hereafter graduating shall be eligible, &c.

That makes it as clear as anything can be.

Mr. BOYER. Would it not obviate all difficulty to insert after the word "eligible" the words "immediately upon graduation?"

Mr. BLAINE. Well, put those words in.

Mr. BOYER. Let the amendment read:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible, immediately upon graduation, to appointments, &c.

The SPEAKER. The question had better first be taken on the motion to reconsider.

The question was taken; and the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BOYER's amendment.

Mr. BOYER. I will modify my amendment so as to read:

Provided, however, That graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible, immediately upon graduation, to appointments as second lieutenants without such service.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. We all have some knowledge about these military matters, of course. I must show mine by moving an amendment. I like portions each of the Senate bill and of the House bill better than some portions of the other.

Now, I see that by the Senate bill two regiments of colored troops, out of the six regiments that are to be added, are provided for. I think that that ought to be so in the House bill. That has been omitted unless it has been inserted in some other section. I suppose it has not been, and I move, therefore, to amend this third section by inserting, after the word "regiments," in the ninth line, the words "two of which shall be composed of colored men;" so that it shall read:

That to the six regiments of cavalry now in the service there shall be added six regiments, two of which shall be composed of colored men, &c.

I offer this amendment because I believe that colored troops do better as cavalry than perhaps in any other branch of the service. They have been skillful horsemen all their lives. If there was anything they were taught by their southern masters it was how to ride on horseback. I understand from officers who have served with them that they make excellent cavalry, so far as they have had any experience. I think, therefore, they should have an opportunity of serving in that branch of the service, and hence I approve of the Senate proposition rather than that of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will only remark upon this subject that, after looking over the whole ground, it was concluded by the Committee on Military Affairs to report in favor of eight regiments of colored infantry troops, without making any cavalry regiments consist of the same character of troops. We have nothing especially to say about it except to submit the question to the House whether they will not agree to that suggestion of the committee. I have no feeling about it one way or the other. If it be thought by the House that two of the six new regiments of cavalry should be colored troops, it will not in any way affect the bill in its other features.

Mr. CHANLER. I think this proposition coming from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is certainly consistent. I do not see why colored troops should not be employed in this branch of the service as well as in any other. I do not doubt but that the colored troops are valuable soldiers and fought well in the late war. I am willing to go further and invite the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take the lead and authorize this Government to enroll colored troops as officers in the United States Army. A petition has been presented to the House on this very subject, and the Committee on Military Affairs refused to grant its prayer. You have soldiers enough here to witness it, and the whole country has witnessed the sincerity of your arguments in behalf of the colored troops. If Hannibal crossed the Alps and is worthy of being quoted here for introducing colored troops into his army, go on and let your Hannibals supplant your Grants.

There is a list published in the morning papers of to-day of military members of this House who propose holding a public meeting in this city. Their names are headed by the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee, and it contains with one or two exceptions the names of all the officers who are members of this House upon the other side, who served as volunteers in the Army of the United States. I do not see the name of any man who served from this side of the House, although there are those who so served.

I wish to know from the chairman of the Military Committee if he shrinks from placing the officers of the Army of the United States in competition with negroes. Is he afraid to enter into that fair and open field of competition to which he has invited the common soldier to enter in this proposed reorganization of the Army? Is it fear or is it prejudice that leads him to refuse to do that? Is he ignorant of the capacity of the negro, or is he influenced to such an extent by the narrow-minded habits of life in which the honorable gentleman has been educated that he cannot see the injustice of his own bill?

Now, if his system of organizing the American Army is worth anything, it should be consistent; it should be a unit with itself. There should be no difference or distinction on account of race or color either in the ranks or among the officers. The gentleman seems to shirk the responsibility of elevating the negro race. The gentlemen of the Military Committee seem to tremble for their own personal distinction in that respect.

I look with eagerness and interest to the course pursued by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] His intimate relations with the colored race, his knowledge of their virtues and their fascinations enable him to advocate the necessity of giving the colored race an opportunity of entering the military service of this country. He understands fully the reasons why the doors should be thrown open to the descendants of the black race, who bear the proud stains of the highest men in the Government of this country to-day or in the past, whose mothers were the victims of the seductive charms of the witty white man. I congratulate the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he is not ignorant of their virtues, their courage, or their merits, and I respect him when he comes forward as the champion of the black race, and insists that the President of the United States, under his general power as the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, shall invite the worthy of the black race to positions in it; and do it, too, under the provisions of the civil rights bill, which, having made them citizens of the United States, should also admit them as members of the Army by this bill to reorganize your Army.

The civil rights bill having been passed, the laws under which your Army is now organized gives the power to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. And I wish to see no laggard philanthropy huddling about the poor privates of the Army, but they should be allowed the highest grades that white men have been allowed to reach. Now, the gentlemen of the Military Committee know very well the ability and capacity which the corporals and sergeants of the colored troops have acquired by their service in the Army to this time. And I want to know why, in the present state of public opinion, those gentlemen have not brought forward in their bill a proposition so laudable, so consistent, so patriotic, so just, and so absolutely necessary to meet the exigencies of the civil rights bill which they have forced upon us.

I do not want to see the gentleman, the chairman of the Military Committee, confine his liberality to the private soldiers of the regular Army, I want to see him, with that manly courage which has always characterized him, take the part of the humble officers of the colored troops, the sergeants and corporals; take them by the hand and lead them up to the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of all our armies, and claim for them positions as officers in the Army. He knows the arguments which have been used here so often on every occasion. The blood of our brave colored troops has flowed in rivulets upon every battle-field of this great war, while those who urged by persistent arguments the necessity for the use of the black man as a soldier remained here in this House, or but seldom exercised their prowess on the field.

I hope an amendment will be made in this spirit. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will lead us on. He is the Moses of the day. Let him lead on in this great work; and let the gentlemen of the Military Committee hold up the hands of the modern Moses, so that these people may pass over in safety. And the time will not be far distant when the military organization of this country will be filled by the patriotic members of the colored race.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANLER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) no quorum having appeared on the last vote, ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. BLAINE and CHANLER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. GRIDER. It was my understanding that the House was dividing on ordering the yeas and nays. It was certainly my intention that the tellers should be, not on the amendment, but on ordering the yeas and nays. I demanded tellers on the yeas and nays at the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Kentucky demand tellers on the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused, and the Chair ordered tellers on the amendment, as there was no quorum on the previous vote.

Mr. CHANLER. I insist that the division shall go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPALDING moved that there be a call of the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I insist there shall be a division in reference to the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order, as the House refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I think there is a quorum present now, and I hope by unanimous consent the tellers will again take their places.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. FINCK. We want the yeas and nays. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. FINCK. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 28, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Davis, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Hooper, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, Loan, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Broomall, Buckland, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Randall, Rogers, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Sloan Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. TROWBRIDGE stated that his colleague, Mr. BEAMAN, was compelled to leave the House by indisposition.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLAINE. I move, after the words "any portion of the cavalry force herein authorized may be dismounted and armed and drilled as infantry at the discretion of the President," to insert the following:

But the number so dismounted shall be taken, so far as the interests of the service will permit, proportionately and impartially from the several cavalry regiments.

I will explain the object and the necessity for this amendment. The cavalry service consists at present of six regiments. It is proposed to add six. There is a great deal of jealousy among the cavalry when they are dismounted, and the natural operation would be that those who are last enlisted would be, in a body, or as whole regiments, kept dismounted, and the old regiments would be kept mounted, and a great deal of discontent and unfairness would be the result.

The Senate bill undertakes to remove that trouble by proposing that not exceeding four companies of each regiment shall be dismounted. The effect of that will be to make twelve cavalry regiments of eight companies each. My amendment simply means this: that the portion dismounted, whatever it may be in the judgment of those having charge of the matter, shall, so far as the interest of the service will allow, be impartially shared between all the regiments of the cavalry service, which will remove jealousy and create fair play all around.

I need not say, perhaps, that I move this with the assent of the members of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend section three by adding this at the end:

And such regiment shall have one veterinary surgeon, whose compensation shall be $125 per month.

It applies only to the cavalry. These persons employed now are receiving about seventy-five dollars, and rank as sergeants. They get certain allowances, but they are paid an amount about sufficient to secure the service of competent, scientific horse doctors.

It has been suggested to me in a communication on the subject by the chief of the Cavalry Bureau that it is absolutely necessary, in order that proper persons may be secured, that the pay should be somewhat increased. And every one acquainted with the cavalry service will understand how essential this officer is.

It is also proposed to give them the rank, without command, of captain. I cannot bring my mind to assent to that proposition. I see no reason why, without command, we should give them that rank. But I think the pay should be increased so as to afford additional inducement for securing good officers. This $125 per month will be the entire compensation. They will be without any allowances or emoluments if this amendment shall pass. It amounts to $1,500 a year, which I think is necessary.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] suggests $100 a month. I think it is not, and in the opinion of the chief of the Cavalry Bureau, men cannot be engaged for that sum who are of the right character.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest $100 a month, assimilating it to the amount paid by the Government to contract surgeons in the Army. A large portion of the surgeons that were employed during the war received but $100 per month.

I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that veterinary surgeons are necessary in the cavalry service. Such regiments when mounted cannot well do without them. And I agree that the Government has not paid enough for such officers. During the fore part of the war they only received, I believe, the pay of sergeant major. Latterly they were paid seventy-five dollars per month. I think $100, which is half way between seventy-five dollars and $125, will command the service of veterinary surgeons certainly as well as $100 will command the services of surgeons qualified to take charge of hospitals. I therefore move that amendment.

Mr. HALE. I wish to submit to the chairman of the committee whether a horse doctor ought to have better pay than a doctor of men. The assistant surgeon of the Army is the medical officer of the regiment, and he gets a less sum than this bill proposes for a horse doctor. According to the present bill his pay and allowances amount to less than $125 a month, and he ranks as lieutenant. It seems to me that a man who doctors horses ought not to be paid more than one who attends to the cure of the ills of the human race.

Mr. SCHENCK. The assistant surgeon ranks as lieutenant of cavalry. He gets less pay, but a great deal more compensation, because he gets certain rations and allowances for servants' rations and clothing, and various little things which go to make up the compensation, which are not taken into the account when you talk about his pay proper. By the bill before the House the first lieutenant gets $1,800 and the second lieutenant $1,600.

Mr. HALE. By the Army Register an assistant surgeon of less than five years' service ranks as first lieutenant, and his total pay and allowances amount to $112 83 per month.

Mr. SCHENCK. That may be so published.

As I said before, this is one of the difficulties we have to encounter to know what they do get. Where the officer gets pay, commutation, and allowances, the first lieutenant of cavalry, for instance, in this city, gets $2,088 41 a year. The allowance for fuel is $198, and for quarters $432, and if that be taken off, it still leaves the amount more than $1,200.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In Washington city the allowance for these items is about double what it is elsewhere.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] thinks $1,200 is enough, I am not desirous of disputing the matter with him, but will leave it to the House. Only I say that the present compensation is insufficient, and that if we appoint men fit for the places we must give them more than they are now receiving.

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question, and it is a question which I wish at this time to submit to that committee, who are presenting to us an entirely new bill for the organization of the Army. I would inquire whether it is not desirable, in framing such a bill as this, to change the whole system of compensation, doing away with the complicated machinery of allowances and rations. I would like to know of the chairman of the committee, or of some one competent to answer it, whether it is not possible to frame a bill which shall dispense entirely with this complicated system of compensation.

Mr. SCHENCK. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] I will say that in my view just such legislation is needed. And it is in consequence of that conviction that I have reported, with the authority of the Military Committee to back me, a bill to fix the compensation of the officers of the Army in an intelligible shape, and that bill he will find on his file.

After we get through this bill it may perhaps not be impolitic to move that bill as an addendum, so as to include all in one bill. This bill might be modified by striking out the words "emoluments and allowances" wherever they occur. I have not thought it advisable, however, to bring it before the House for it will be hard enough against the influences surrounding us to fight through either one of these bills, I think. And I know that we shall have to rally with all the strength we can, those of us who think as I do, and as I am glad to see the gentleman does, on the subject of compensation, before we can get any bill of this kind through the House against outside influence and Army influence.

I make this reply merely to satisfy the gentleman that that subject has not passed unnoticed, and that there is a bill to accomplish the very object the gentleman desires now on file.

The amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to strike out $125 and insert $100, was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would inquire if it be in order to move to go back to section two for the purpose of amending it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will hear what the gentleman proposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I propose to amend by inserting in section two, after the word "artillery," the following:

That there shall be appointed a chief of artillery with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, who shall have charge, under the direction of the War Department, of all matters pertaining to the artillery arm of the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to going back for the purpose of allowing that amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would inquire if it will be in order at any stage of the bill to introduce this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not at the present moment prepared to answer that question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will withdraw it, and move hereafter to add it as a new section. That I am told I can do.

Mr. ROSS. I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to remodel and reform the bill so as to reduce the Army to a number not exceeding forty thousand men.

Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be well versed in military affairs. But I have been unable to see the necessity of so large a standing army as that provided by the bill reported by the committee. It is very expensive to maintain so large an army in the field. And I do not regard such an army as being in consonance with the theory of our institutions. Our dependence for defense is not upon a standing army. In case of an invasion of our country, or any infraction of our rights, our reliance has always been upon the volunteers who respond promptly to the call of the Government for the purpose of repelling invasion and maintaining our rights.

I have not heard from any gentleman the necessity for fastening upon a people already burdened and borne down by the weight of taxation the enormous expense of a large standing army. I would be glad if some member of the Military Committee, or some other member of the House who may be conversant with the subject, would inform us as to the expense of keeping a regiment in the field. I know that last year there was testimony taken before the Committee on Territories in relation to the expense of keeping a regiment of cavalry in the Indian country. And military men testified before that committee that the entire expense of keeping a regiment of cavalry in service in that country was $2,000,000 per annum. Of course it would not be so expensive to maintain a regiment in other parts of the country.

Sir, I cannot give my consent to burden the people of this country with further taxation for this purpose, unless there is more apparent necessity for it than any which I have been able to discover, and therefore I have moved, and I trust such may be the opinion of this House, that this bill be recommitted with instructions to remodel and refashion its provisions in accordance with what I have suggested.

I have no disposition to protract debate upon this question. I desired merely to express my opinion upon the subject. And I shall be glad, if a sufficient number shall coincide with me, to be permitted to record our votes in favor of an Army of not exceeding forty thousand men in time of peace.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not hitherto participated in any manner in the debate on this bill. But I have been unable, by any examination I can give it, to see what necessity there is at this time for any such law at all as this. I have had no satisfactory reason shown to me that there is any insufficiency in the Army as now organized, and as it has been organized since the foundation of the Government, under the old system and by virtue of the principles upon which it has been organized.

I entirely agree with the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] as to the impropriety at this time of keeping a large standing army. It was the wisdom of our fathers, and they gave it out to their children as a settled axiom in American history, that large standing armies in time of peace were not only dangerous to liberty, but they involved the country in heavy and enormous expenses. And during the whole period of our political and national history, from the first formation of the Army of this country down to this time, I believe at no time, when the country was not involved in war, have we had an Army to exceed the maximum of twenty-five or thirty thousand men.

Now, after we have gone through this rebellion, and marshaled armies more gigantic and enormous, perhaps, than any that ever were marshaled upon the fields of this country, and I might say upon any other since civilization began, what necessity is there to change the organization of the Army which existed during all that period. When the first tocsin of war was sounded, we found men so ready through our volunteer system that it was but a short time before we had a million men in the field, able to put down the most gigantic rebellion that ever raised its hydra head upon any continent, and to subdue any army ever marshaled on earth.

Sir, when this war began, a proclamation was issued by President Lincoln, calling for seventy-five thousand men, for the purpose of putting down the rebellion, thus illustrating the esteem and consideration with which the people of this country have regarded small standing armies. It had long been settled in the minds of the people that a large standing army was not necessary; and although when that call was made the regular Army of our nation numbered only fifteen or twenty thousand men, the hills and the valleys poured out like water men who were ready at a moment's call to march forth in defense of their country's cause, and assist in putting down the fearful rebellion which has so recently closed.

Sir, I am satisfied from the experience of the country during the last seventy-five years that there never was a time in our history when the situation of this country required a smaller army than is necessary at the present time. There is no danger of any more civil commotions; there is no danger of any further rebellion. The power of the Government has been maintained. Our Government has shown itself to be formidable and omnipotent. It has demonstrated that it is abundantly able to put down any rebellion. It has shown itself strong enough to cope successfully with any army which may be raised against it, whether marshaled in this country or any other.

Sir, an army of such numbers as we had before the rebellion will be sufficient hereafter for all practical purposes. There is no necessity that, at a time when the people are already groaning under the onerous burden of taxation, they should be subjected to still heavier burdens to support in time of peace an army of seventy-five or eighty thousand men. Sir, as soon as you adopt the doctrines of the monarchists of the Old World and establish in this country the system of maintaining a large standing army in time of peace, that very moment you menace liberty and destroy one of the foundation principles of our republican institutions.

In reference to this question of a standing army, I am willing to stand by the doctrines of Washington and Jefferson and Madison, and the other founders of our Government, who have bequeathed to us the principle that standing armies in times of peace are dangerous to republican institutions. A republican Government must rest for its foundation upon the consent and affection of the people. Their patriotism must be relied upon as its sure defense in the hour of peril. Large standing armies are simply a menace to popular liberty.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. How large does the gentleman understand the Army to be now, and to what number would he have it reduced?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know how large the Army is now. I am not prepared to say. I am not very well versed in military affairs. But I am prepared to say that I am for reducing the Army to as low a standard as is consistent with the preservation of the peace of the country—as low a standard as has been necessary at any time within the last twenty-five years.

Mr. GRINNELL. How low?

Mr. ROGERS. Fifteen or twenty thousand. Forty thousand as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] would be a very liberal allowance indeed, and would certainly be as large an army as the tax-burdened people of this country should be called on to maintain in time of peace. Such is the patriotism and courage of our people that they can always be relied on to come forward as volunteers in overwhelming numbers to vanquish any foe, whether from without or within, and to maintain the honor and integrity of the country.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he would, in this or any future emergency, enlist the Fenians.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know whether we can enlist the Fenians. I think that the Fenians are able to take care of themselves. I suppose that the gentleman, if he has any love of liberty, will, in common with all other men who rejoice to see republics established everywhere, give his sympathy and aid to the Fenians in their effort to throw off the yoke of tyranny with which England has oppressed the Irish people for the last seven hundred years.

I suppose the gentleman has not yet forgotten we were once under the tyranny and bondage of England. I hope he has not forgotten we spurned the right of taxation assumed by Great Britain, that we proclaimed our independence, that our forefathers spilled their blood in defense of their freedom; and I trust that gentlemen will now sympathize with the downtrodden people of Ireland who are making the same effort to relieve themselves from the same despotism of England.

But, sir, this country is not England. It is a republic. It is one which exists in the sympathy and love of the people. It is bound together by the iron bands of affection, which can never be broken or rent asunder. There is no necessity, therefore, existing in this free country to keep officers in pay at thousands of dollars a year, who have nothing to do in a time of peace except to lounge about the country.

Why, Mr. Speaker, our taxes are now burdening us down. We have a national debt of $3,000,000,000. That is exclusive of the debts of the States, of perhaps $1,000,000,000 more. It is the bounden duty of the people to pay every dollar of that debt. Let us keep our faith and obligation with the people with whom we contracted this debt. Let us bend our energies in such way that the resources of the country will come under our command freely, from the hearts of the people, without resistance on their part or oppression on ours. And it is mainly on the ground that this adds enormously to our expenses that I am opposed to it.

The idea of allowing it to be in the power of any person who may be at the head of our military establishment, or of the President of the United States, a corrupt or ambitious man if you please, to control so vast a standing army, is radically wrong. He may use it to control the affairs of the Government and to accomplish the objects of his personal ambition like some of the leaders in ancient Rome and elsewhere. It is dangerous to the liberties of the people. It is introducing an element into the Government which in the end will prostrate the best interests of the whole country.

There is no necessity for it. No gentleman, so far as I have heard, has been able to show any necessity for an increase of our standing Army.

Let me say there never were better rules and regulations established for the army of any country than those established by our fathers for the Army of this country. That Army has been marshaled and successfully sustained and upheld under those rules and regulations. Those regulations have been accorded by the people of the old continent in reference to military government to be as perfect in theory and application as those of any country in the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his proposition. When this bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and taken up for consideration it was agreed that we should go through it section by section, giving a liberal allowance of fifteen minutes to each member for debate, so that the measure could be perfected. Propositions like the one now pending interjected in this way will, of course, only give rise to this sloshy-washy debate. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. ROSS. I regret I cannot comply with the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes sixteen, noes not counted.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Tellers are not ordered, and the yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. I understand when one side of the House is counted we have a right to have the other side counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demanded the yeas and nays and tellers on the yeas and nays, but on a division there were not enough to order either the tellers or the yeas and nays.

The motion to recommit was disagreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend by adding a provision that the Army at no time shall exceed thirty thousand men; and I move that amendment for the purpose of occupying the attention of the House for about three minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order, that the provision that the Army at no time shall exceed thirty thousand men has nothing to do with this section. I not only make the point of order, but I appeal—

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will not find fault with me if he will permit me to go on.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, we will have the same old speech over again. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. I offer this amendment more for the purpose of vindicating myself, than anything else, from the malicious assaults which the honorable gentleman from the State of Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has made it his business to make upon me every time I have got up to say anything in this House. I suppose that he knows very well that during the remarks which I made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois I confined myself strictly to the question before the House. This House will bear me witness in saying that in no arguments which I make before this House do I digress from the subject under debate, and that I always confine myself strictly to the subject before the House. I make no general speeches; no Saturday speeches. I mean no disrespect to anybody else, but I think I ought to be treated with common respect, at least, by the gentleman from Maine when I get up to address the House.

When my resolutions, over which I had no control, came up a week or two since, I had the floor, and the Speaker of the House told the House the reasons why I was entitled to the floor, and because I would not yield the right which I then had the gentleman from Maine got up and abused me and treated me in a most shameful and indecorous manner; in such a manner as I would treat no member either on this side of the House or on the other. The House will bear me witness of the truth that I always treated gentlemen upon all sides of this House with the utmost courtesy. Nobody has known me to get up and browbeat and abuse any member because he did not agree with me. God made us so that our natures are different, and we arrive at different conclusions, and I think it is most contemptible and indiscreet work on the part of the gentleman, when I undertake to discuss any subject, to attempt to browbeat me and insult me. In what I have said I have no ill-feeling toward the gentleman at all. I hold him in high respect. I believe him to be a gentleman, and shall always treat him with courtesy. All that I ask of him is that he shall treat me in the same way. He is a member on the other side of the House, and he is only entitled to the same rights that I am. When he speaks on any question he never finds me slurring him for what he says. Although I may not say what will suit the other side of the House, I speak the honest dictates of an honest heart and the views I entertain, and I do not like to be abused for my honest convictions by any gentleman upon the other side of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from New Jersey says that I have taken occasion whenever he has spoken to say something indecorous or unbecoming. Yet he cites only two occasions in which I have offered any remarks about him. If he will remember how frequently he has addressed this House, and can only remember those two occasions, he must see that there must have been a good many times when I have not referred to him at all. Now, I never have had the slightest unkind feeling toward the gentleman from New Jersey in my life. Two or three weeks ago, on a Monday morning, by means of a mere accident in parliamentary rule, which happens perhaps once in twenty-five years, the gentleman had an opportunity to exhaust the whole morning hour in a debate in which neither himself nor any other member of the House was interested, and I appealed to the gentleman personally to yield the floor, inasmuch as there were many gentlemen on this side of the House who had resolutions to offer—not resolutions of a political character, but of a business nature, which could only be introduced under the call of States on alternate Mondays. The gentleman agreed that he would not take more than twenty minutes, but then he continued for the entire hour; and in the heat of the moment I made some remarks that were hasty and unbecoming, as I have since thought. If I thereby wounded the gentleman in any way I am very sorry for it; and I will say in addition, that I have none but the kindest feeling for him personally. He has always treated me with respect, and I desire to treat him in the same way.

Mr. ROGERS. That is sufficient.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know to what part of this section this debate applies. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not yet advised.

Mr. ROGERS. I want but a moment more.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentlemen have exhausted their reasons for reducing the Army, I will move the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. Wait until my fifteen minutes are through, if you please.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask but a moment more. The gentleman from Maine says that my arguments upon the resolutions which I offered had interest neither for the House nor for myself nor anybody else. [Laughter.]

The gentleman is mistaken about that; it was a very important question, and I presume the House will remember that when first I came here, I think in the first week or in the second, I offered a joint resolution which was referred to the Judiciary Committee, to authorize the States to tax United States securities, and the remarks which I made were therefore entirely pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must really rise to a question of order.

Mr. ROGERS. It is not necessary. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to amend the section by inserting at the end of it the following proviso:

Provided further, That officers of the same grade above the rank of first lieutenant, who shall be appointed under the provisions of this section, shall have their rank determined by their last previous rank, whether in the volunteer service or not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from New York will not put that on a section with which it has nothing to do whatever. This section relates to a cavalry force. His amendment refers to an entirely different and separate question. I suggest that he add it to the bill as a separate section, otherwise we shall make this bill a piece of unmeaning patchwork.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. The only way in which I could offer it appropriately would be to move to strike out the whole section and insert this in lieu of it.

Mr. SCHENCK. This section applies to an organization of six new cavalry regiments to be added to the six now in the service, and this general military legislation, intended to apply to all officers of all arms of the service, is incongruous with this part of the bill. I hope the gentleman will so far aid the committee in perfecting the bill as to reserve his motion and offer it as a distinct section at a later period.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. If that will conduce to the convenience of the Committee on Military Affairs I will withdraw my amendment for the present, and offer it at another time.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out in line five the word "comprising," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "constituting."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOYER. I offer the following amendment.

In line six after the word "regiments," strike out all the remainder of the section, as follows:

Of ten regiments, to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps; and of eight regiments of colored men, to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided, to be known as United States colored troops.

This bill, as interpreted by the chairman of the Military Committee, provides for an army of fifty thousand men, but with an organization capable of expansion to eighty-two thousand six hundred men. That is, there are to be regiments organized and officers appointed sufficient for an army of eighty-two thousand six hundred strong, and the President is to have the authority to recruit it to its maximum strength whenever in his discretion he may decide that the exigencies of the service require it. To this large increase of the regular Army as a peace establishment I desire to record my opposition. I have great respect for the opinion of the able and patriotic chairman of the Military Committee, who has told us that he had been in favor of a still greater increase. I have also, in common with the whole country, profound respect for the military judgment of the Lieutenant General, who, we are told, has expressed himself in favor of the enlargement of the standing Army to the extent contemplated by this bill. Still I cannot bring myself to see its necessity.

No one, I suppose, will contend that a larger standing army should be maintained in time of peace than the exigencies of the country require. Now, what exigencies do exist which require such an army as is provided by this bill as a permanent peace establishment? The rebellion is over. At least there is not a man now in arms against the Government in any part of the country. The President has proclaimed peace. The late rebellious States are submissively and patiently waiting at the doors of Congress for peaceful recognition in the reestablished Union, the authority of which none of them any longer disputes. The Indian frontier is quiet, and likely to need less force to keep it so than was heretofore required. There is no immediate danger of a foreign war, and if such an occasion were to arise half a million of volunteers could be raised in thirty days, either for defense or invasion. During the present generation, at least, our volunteer forces would not be found wanting either in disciplined men or experienced officers. Why, then, shall we now provide for a standing army of over eighty thousand men?

Upon the general principle, then, that a larger standing army than the exigency demands is not in accordance with the nature or safety of our institutions, and also upon the ground of public economy, I move the amendment which I have offered. If it should prevail it will save over eight millions a year to the country, and still leave an army which, when raised to its maximum standard, will number over sixty thousand men. I think the reduction can best be made by striking off that portion of the proposed army which must prove the least efficient, namely, the Veteran Reserve corps and the colored regiments.

As respects the Veteran Reserve corps, I agree with the remarks made on last Friday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.] I think the country owes to the disabled Union officers and soldiers of the late war a reasonable support, but not in the Army. I shall always be found ready to vote to the maimed heroes of the war liberal provision in the shape of pensions, but I am not in favor of providing for ten regiments of disabled soldiers as a part of the Army of the United States.

As for the colored regiments, I believe they can perform no military duties which could not better be performed by white men. They are not wanted as soldiers at the North, and at the South they would prove a continual source of irritation, complaint, and disquiet. On the Indian frontiers they would be less efficient than white soldiers, for their fear of Indians is proverbial. I maintain that to the white men of the United States rightfully belongs the government of the country in peace and its defense in war. And if the time should ever come when they are no longer equal to the performance of these duties the hour of our national dissolution will have arrived.

I entertain no expectation that this amendment will prevail because from our past experience we know that when the majority of this House have once got hold of the negro upon any question they never surrender him from their embraces, but I have moved this amendment and I shall endeavor to get a record vote upon it. I demand the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 79, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Brandegee, Chanler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Edwin N. Hubbell, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, and Sitgreaves—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Buckland, Bundy, Coffroth, Conkling, Davis, Deffrees, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hill, Holmes, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elisha B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bingham, Blow, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hlogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Laffin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, Morrill, Newell, Neill, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander II. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Seefeld, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—88.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. WARD. I move that the evening session for to-day be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend this fourth section by striking out the words "of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps."

I make this motion from no desire whatever to do wrong or injustice to any man who has served gallantly in the armies of the Republic. But I do it because as a legislator, responsible in some degree for the enactments that may be passed here, I believe it my duty to make this motion to amend.

Now, among the reasons which I beg leave to assign for this amendment is, in the first place, the vastly increased expense to be entailed upon the Government by the organization of ten additional regiments which under no circumstances can perform more than one half the duty of the same number of efficient and able-bodied men. I had occasion to state on Friday last the expense to which these ten additional regiments will subject the Government in the way of their organization, equipment, and maintenance. I stated that if only the minimum of these regiments was organized the expense for the pay proper alone of the officers and men would be nearly nine hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, and the gentleman missed the correct figures in his estimation by just half a million dollars.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not get it high enough.

Mr. SCHENCK. A half million too high.

Mr. DAVIS. I am satisfied I got it too low. I desire to increase the sum named, and to say that the pay proper of these regiments will cost the Government $1,300,000 per annum if the organization shall reach only the minimum provided for. That is for their pay alone.

Now, when you come to add to that their equipment, maintenance, &c., you will see that we are rolling up an immense indebtedness. And for what? For the purpose of furnishing employment to men who have been disabled in the service; and that kind of employment which, for the interest of the Government, should be performed only by able and efficient men.

Now, I submit that any man, who under any circumstance will enlist in this Veteran Reserve corps, can, with a moderate and reasonable pension from the Government, obtain a competent support by adding thereto some employment which he will be able to perform in some walk of private life. Therefore it will be doing no wrong to these men if we pay them the pensions to which they are entitled, if we give them the encouragement which we ought by our liberality, and then say to them, "Although we deal liberally with you in consequence of your past services, we do not feel bound to pay you full pay as officers in this organization." I believe there is no principle of justice or propriety which demands it.

I believe that the interests of this country require that we should strike out this clause entirely. It is well known that if you take ten regiments of disabled troops and put them into any service where efficiency and activity are required, they cannot do more than one-half the service which efficient and able-bodied men can perform.

Now, sir, I think that the striking out of the provision for these ten regiments will be proper. I do not believe that to reduce by ten regiments the Army proposed by this bill will be any injury to this Government. Throughout our previous history, we have at all times been able to preserve the peace of the country with an army far fewer in numbers than that now proposed; and although I admit that there is a necessity for a larger force at present, in consequence of the increased extent of our country and the peculiar condition of affairs now existing in some portions of it, yet I am not ready to say that such an army as we would have if these ten regiments should be stricken out, an army capable of being raised to seventy-two thousand seven hundred men, would not be sufficient to meet all the demands of the Government. I trust, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I remember, Mr. Speaker, when the Veteran Reserve corps was organized; and I remember, too, that at that time it was understood that that organization was to be a permanent one. When the men who now compose that organization, or so much of it as is left, had so far recovered from wounds and disabilities incurred in active service that they believed themselves fit for the military duty assigned to this corps, they appeared before a competent military board, and if on examination were found to possess the requisite military knowledge, and by a suitable medical board they were found to possess the necessary physical strength for the performance of the duties assigned them, they were mustered into the service.

Sir, those of this Veteran Reserve corps who now remain in service—many of them have been mustered out—are No. 1 men. They have been tested on the field of battle, and not found wanting. They are men of courage and experience; and I say it is a slander upon a noble organization to say that these men cannot do half the service that can be rendered by men who have never seen service in the field. I say that a man with a cork leg and with only one arm, if he has ordinary ability in other respects, is as capable of doing duty at a fort or a military rendezvous in time of peace as any man.

I hold, sir, that this nation has some interest in caring for the men who constitute this Veteran Reserve corps. We have no right to muster them summarily out of the service, saying to them, "We are willing to give you a pension of $100 or $200 a year, and with this, you can, if you exercise ordinary prudence and economy, make your living."

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman has stated that, when this corps was organized, there was an understanding, in some way, or on the part of somebody, that it was to be a permanent organization. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House on what he relies on making that assertion?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; if it is a matter of any importance, I will do so. I state from my recollection that, at the time of the organization of this corps, it was so understood. I remember that I spoke with reference to it myself. I recollect that an officer of my own State consulted me with reference to the question whether he had better give up the business by which he could make a livelihood at home for the purpose of going into the Veteran Reserve corps. I remember that I told him that I supposed it would be a permanent organization, and that therefore it would be advisable for him to go into it as a lieutenant, the pay of which position would be sufficient, under ordinary circumstances to support him and his family.

It was my understanding, and I think it was the general understanding, that that corps should be a permanent organization. I know that there are now in that corps men who abandoned their ordinary pursuits and professions to enter this corps, believing in good faith that they could by the services which they would render compensate the Government for its outlay in maintaining that organization. Does any gentleman believe that those men would have entered that corps if they had understood that they were to remain only a year or eighteen months, and were then to be turned off that their places might be filled by able-bodied men?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the gentleman put that question for the purpose of having it answered?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I do not care to be interrupted just now.

Mr. CONKLING. If the gentleman desires an answer, I would be glad to give it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But I can answer for myself. It is a plain and real answer. They did not dream of such a thing. They supposed they were part of the Army of the United States, and that we would take a pride in them for the services they had rendered; that their organization should have the dignity and something of the éclat of the "Old Guard."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Veteran Reserve corps can be pointed to with pride and glory by American citizens, for they have proved the defenders of the Republic against a wicked, inhuman, and atrocious rebellion. And a generous people will recognize their services and provide for and maintain them in their military pride and glory as a part of the United States Army.

I deny that the Veteran Reserve corps are inadequate to discharge the duties of any ordinary post or garrison of any branch of the service while the country is at peace. I beg the country and this House not to disregard the claims—yes, sir, the claims of these noble soldiers. Let us maintain this organization as an independent organization of the Army, whether it consist of five or ten regiments. I am not satisfied we need fifty thousand or sixty thousand men in a time of peace to maintain the dignity of this country. When I am convinced that we do I shall vote for such number of men, but not until I am. I shall want to hear further from the Committee on Military Affairs or those who have carefully investigated the subject. But whether the Army shall consist of twenty-five thousand men or fifty thousand men, I insist that the Veteran Reserve corps, men who have nobly won renown upon the field of battle, shall have their place in the Army and shall not be overslaughed by any opposition from any quarter, whether it be under the guise of pretended economy or by the regular Army or by any other interest whatever.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. As it is a glorious thing to belong to the Army, I ask why it is the gentleman was not heard of in the war?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I tell you I was required at home to take care of just such contemptible "copperheads" as that gentleman. [Laughter.] My services were required at home. If all the patriotic and honest men like myself had gone to the front such "copperheads" as you would have taken the country, and it would have gone to eternal ruin. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know from the gentleman why he has not taken care of the copperheads?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say that we have. [Renewed applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Applause in the galleries and upon the floor is out of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say that we have taken good care of the "copperheads."

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order. Is it in order, in public debate to go to the country, for one member to abuse his fellow-member of the house by calling him a contemptible copperhead?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish the decision had been that it was in order, as he has not more contempt for me than I have for him.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not care about anything he says. It matters nothing to me. [Laughter.] I have been used to hearing their slang and their slanders for several years. I wish to say I did not personally call him contemptible, but his political party which has embarrassed the Union party, which has encouraged the rebellion, which has done all it could to defeat the Government in its great struggle with the rebellion. I do call them contemptible.

Mr. ROGERS. Is that in order?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think it is in order.

Mr. ROGERS. On what ground?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Because it is the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. Is it in order for a member to stand here and abuse another party? If it is, I am willing to have this out. [Cries of "Order!"] If there are traitors anywhere they are in the other party. [Continued cries of "Order!"] They are the disunionists today, and we are the only real Union men in the country.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That the gentleman from Wisconsin is out of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For interrupting the proceedings of the House without the consent of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Jersey ought not to be decided before any other. I want to know whether it is not as proper for me to call the gentleman from Illinois a traitor, as I do, as for him to call me a "copperhead."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is out of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor. [Laughter.] I want it understood that I place upon whatever the gentleman from Wisconsin has said no sort of importance—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls the gentleman to order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has decided that the gentleman from Illinois was out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decided that his application to the gentleman from Wisconsin was out of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule, that being decided to be out of order, the gentleman from Illinois must take his seat.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order. The Chair has decided a moment ago that—

Mr. ROGERS. One point at a time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will suspend. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] raises the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] was held by the Chair to have been out of order. That was so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not doubt that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] as applied to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] was out of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The question of order goes further.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] shall take his seat until the House permits him to proceed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My time has not expired yet, I believe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has not yet expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] insists that the rule shall be enforced, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] having been declared out of order shall take his seat until he is permitted to proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that he be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that he has not yet taken his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will be seated. [Laughter.]

The motion that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Suppose Jeff. Davis should call me a traitor, should I pay any attention to it?

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the question before the House. Jeff. Davis has nothing to do with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. He may have, from present indications. If this copperhead party ever gets into power Jeff. may be one of their leaders.

Mr. ROGERS. I insist that the gentleman should confine himself to the question before the House or take his seat. He is not talking upon the question at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise another question of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has no right to charge upon this side of the House that they are followers of Jeff. Davis, or that he is their leader. It is an abuse of the privileges of this House. I ask the Chair to decide that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the gentleman was not in order in the line of his remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I insist that the rule shall be enforced, and he shall sit down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided that he was not in order in the remarks he was proceeding to make. The gentleman can proceed in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that he cannot go on, when the Chair has decided him out of order, until the House again allows him to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was not in order, was not speaking to the amendment. If he shall speak to the amendment before the House he is in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then my point is not allowed. I desire now to make another question of order of some importance. He has applied to this side of the House the epithet that they are followers of Jeff. Davis. I insist that that is not a proper remark to make against members of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman raises another point of order, that the application of the remark to the side of the House to which the gentleman belongs, that they are followers of Jefferson Davis, is not in order. The Chair cannot decide whether that is in order or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order: that we will withdraw all objection and allow the gentlemen on the other side to proceed if they will allow us to answer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist on knowing what the amendment under consideration is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, namely, to strike out the following from section four:

Often regiments, to be raised and officered as hereafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. McKEE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will do so.

Mr. McKEE. I only wish to make a single statement. So far as this side of the House is concerned there is a part of us at least who do not take any exception whatever to being called followers of Jeff. Davis, because we have never been considered as being in that line. A number of us at least have a record by which the country at large will not put us in that category. As to the gentlemen who are a little further over, that seem to have fears of such charges, there may be some ground for those fears. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was showing the necessity of preserving the Veteran Reserve corps, and in order to do that I was showing that from present proceedings and present indications the rebel power is liable to be restored in this country, with Jeff. Davis at its head.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire of my colleague if he has heard of the result of the municipal election at Peoria, Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir. The copperheads have a majority there, I am sorry to say. [Laughter.] There are some who have been pardoned and restored to political power who are as deeply dyed in crime as Jeff. Davis, his compeers, and coconspirators, and I want to protect the country against such men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD. I move that the House adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of Oliver Goldsmith, and others, dealers in leaf tobacco and manufacturers of cigars in the city of Detroit, praying for relief touching the tariff on imported cigars.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The remonstrance of E. W. Stoughton, William M. Everts, Daniel Lord, Charles O'Connor, James T. Brady, and 58 others, members of the bar, practicing in the Federal courts, against the passage of Senate bill No. 103, to reorganize the Federal judiciary.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with the order of the Senate directing the Chair to appoint a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the concurrent resolution prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors in the Capitol building and grounds, the Chair appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. GUTHRIE.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate a petition numerously signed from the sixth congressional district of Iowa, setting forth that certain persons in the interest of the Des Moines River Navigation Company, a corporation that the petitioners describe as a defunct corporation, are interfering with and making certain improper allegations in regard to the extension of the Dubuque and Sioux City railroad. They assert that the continuance and extension of that road is of great importance to that district and to the State of Iowa, and hope that these allegations will not be credited by Congress. This petition, if there be no objection, will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I think it more appropriately belongs to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to that committee if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of William A. Carter, praying that he may be permitted to preëempt certain sections of land in Utah Territory represented to contain deposits of iron ore and bituminous coal, upon the condition that he construct thereon a blast furnace and foundry; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Joseph W. J. Holmes, sr., praying for compensation for property destroyed in Columbia, South Carolina, by the United States forces under General Sherman; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the petition of certain residents of the town of Martinsburg, Berkeley county, West Virginia, members of the German Evangelical church of that town, praying for relief for the destruction of the church belonging to that denomination by fire during the recent rebellion while occupied by the forces of the United States as quarters for troops. In offering this petition I desire to attract the attention of the Committee on Claims to it. The members of this denomination, the Germans of this country, manifested an unexampled fidelity to the Union during the progress of the war, and were most faithful to it in all sections, and suffered great persecution in the lines of the confederacy. These persons now memorializing Congress are no exception to the general rule. They have not only lost the house in which they worshiped, but they have been great sufferers from the effects of the war individually. I hope the Committee on Claims will give the memorial of these excellent gentlemen and most faithful citizens due consideration, and if it be possible, that the relief they ask for may be granted. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Lizzie A. Jones and Samantha Jones, representing that they lost two brothers in the United States service during the late war, upon whom they were dependent for support, being totally blind, and praying that they may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio in favor of such a modification of the laws now in force as shall clearly leave subject to State taxation national currency and all other obligations and securities of the United States not exempted from such taxation by a subsisting contract with the holders thereof; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented a petition of the American Slate Exchange, of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, praying for a reduction of the tax on American slate and for an increase of the duty on importations of foreign slate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying for an appropriation by Congress to secure a full display of the products of our country at the Exposition to be held at Paris, France, in 1867; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NYE presented the petition of Joseph R. Morris, praying that the Commissioner of Patents may be authorized to issue to him a patent for a new and useful improvement in furnaces; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of James A. Paige and others, late chaplains in the service of the Government, praying that the commutation for fuel and quarters drawn by them from June, 1862, to April, 1863, inclusive, may not be required to be refunded by them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. BROWN. I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the contractors for building the Center market-house on Pennsylvania avenue and Eighth street, inviting the attention of Congress to the subject, which I lay before the Senate, and move to refer to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was sent by mistake to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise for a single moment, sir, to a question of privilege. I find in the Globe of this morning that after I left the Senate Chamber yesterday, pending a personal difficulty forced upon me here, the Senator from California [Mr. McDougall] went on with a long statement of a grievance that he professed to have against me dating as far back as 1852, which he said was the cause of his attack, as I understand the statement he made here. It would fully prove at least that the Senator had a good memory and held revenge better than he holds some other things.

Without dwelling upon this question, sir, I will briefly say that he alludes to a nomination of his, or a candidacy of his, for the House of Representatives in 1852, before the Democratic convention assembled at Benicia, in California, in that year; and he makes a long statement, in regard to which I have no personal knowledge, and most of which, I apprehend, exists only in his own fancies and brain. But he brings to my mind one material fact that I desire to put on record; and for that purpose I rise. I think it is more than probable that I was a member of that convention and would have supported him for Congress but that his chief advocate, the man who put him in nomination, was a notorious traitor, ex-Governor Smith of Virginia, who was then in our State for the express purpose of giving that State to the South as an outlet for the future confederacy. He aimed at political power there and was then laying its foundation, and the man who was put forward in that convention by Smith could not, under any circumstances, secure then any vote of mine, for my purpose in being a member of that convention was to offer all the resistance that I could to the schemes then in embryo and being developed there for the attempt to establish a southern confederacy at a later day, founded upon the corner-stone of slavery. I remember very well that I did reply to Smith in the convention, and thereafter opposed the nomination that he put forward, but that nominee was nominated and elected, and was a member of the House of Representatives in 1854, and, I believe, there voted for the celebrated Kansas-Nebraska act, which was a part of the beginning of the end. That is all that I desire to say on the subject, and I say it only that it may go as a part of this record.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred two memorials of brewers of the United States, praying for a reduction of the duty on barley imported from Canada and the British Provinces in North America, so that it may not exceed the sum of five cents per bushel, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Holman, late additional paymaster in the United States Army, praying that he may be relieved from all responsibility for money alleged to have been stolen from him while acting as paymaster at Boston, Massachusetts, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER THOMPSON.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Alexander Thompson, late United States consul at Maranhão, have had it under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. I think business would be facilitated if the Senate would act on this joint resolution at once. It will take but a minute.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to adjust and pay all proper accounts and claims of Alexander Thompson for salary and services as consul at Maranhão, in Brazil, in as full and ample a manner as if he had been a citizen of the United States while discharging the duties of the office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans;

A bill (H. R. No. 494) for the relief of Martha J. Willey; and

A bill (H. R. No. 495) for the relief of Mary A. Patrick.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner;

A bill (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson; and

A bill (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 25) for the relief of Thomas Hurly;

A bill (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue-cutters;

A bill (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner;

A bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler.

SARAH E. PICKELL.

Mr. JOHNSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell was indefinitely postponed on the 13th instant; and the motion was entered.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand copies of the annual Report of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, to report it back with an amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ten thousand copies of the annual Report of the Commissioner of the Patent Office for the year 1865.

The amendment of the committee was in line two, to strike out "ten" and insert "four;" so as to read, "four thousand copies."

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to say a word in regard to this amendment. It has been customary, ever since I have been connected with the public printing, to print ten thousand copies of the annual Report of the Commissioner of Patents. It is undoubtedly a book of very great value, and if it is proper for the Government to print any documents of this kind for popular distribution, which is a question that may well be considered, this is one of the most valuable. It is the history of the inventive genius of the country for the year that has gone by. It not only disseminates among the people a knowledge of what has been invented, but it stimulates the public ingenuity in all directions. Under ordinary circumstances of the Treasury, the committee would not recommend any reduction of the number to be printed, but probably would recommend an increased number, corresponding with the increase of population and mechanical development; but in the present condition of the Treasury it is deemed advisable that the greatest economy should be used, and it is the determination of the committee to reduce this branch of public expenditure to the lowest point that is consistent with the public interest.

If this resolution and the amendment shall be adopted, I am instructed by the same committee to offer another resolution reducing the number of these documents for 1863 and 1864 in like proportion. Those have not been printed owing to the great pressure on the public Printing Office. If the resolution shall pass as amended, and the other resolution which I shall offer shall pass, it will effect a reduction of sixty per cent., or of eighteen thousand in the whole number of copies.

Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say a few words for the correction of some mistakes into which the country and the Senate have fallen with regard to the expenditures for the public printing. The documents which are distributed are mainly the reports of the executive Departments that contain the history of the Government for the year. They are the reports which the trustees of the people render of their stewardship. They contain a large amount of statistical and historical information of very great value, such as all Governments have been accustomed to put into a permanent form. They must be printed. These great reports as they come to us in manuscript are of no use; they are not accessible; members of the two Houses of Congress must have them in type or they might as well not be presented to them. When they are once put in type it is comparatively little additional cost to strike off copies for the State archives and for public libraries; and the importance of that is very evident, that these documents may be accessible for reference, and that they may be in various places for preservation and security against fire. Then there is another temptation, when this is done, which is liable to considerable abuse, to print large numbers of copies for popular distribution; and the impression seems to prevail throughout the country that this practice is now carried to a greater extent than it has been heretofore; and it is to correct this error that I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the cost of public printing for the last year.

I saw it stated the other day, in a paper of very large circulation, and of very high character, that "Pub. Doc." cost, last year, $2,000,000. The idea intended to be conveyed, and doubtless entertained by the editor, was that we distribute annually $2,000,000 worth of books among the people; and my friend from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks] the other day stated that the public printing had in some way risen from $200,000 to $2,000,000, and he seemed to call upon us for some explanation. This, coming from a Senator generally so accurate as my friend from Indiana is on all matters unless when he is talking on politics, is calculated to produce some impression on the Senate.

The cost of the public printing is undoubtedly a great deal larger than it was, and the reasons for it are too palpable to require more than enumeration. In the first place the country has increased. The same increase that the growth and progress of the country require in all other departments is naturally to be expected to be required in the department of printing, and rather more perhaps with a progressing and enterprising people like ours, because printing may be regarded almost as a type of civilization, and the more progressive a people are the more printing they will require.

Then the war has enormously increased the amount of public printing. The printing that would answer for an army of ten or twenty thousand men that were lying around in barracks would be manifestly but a very small percentage of that required for a million men engaged in active operations all over the country, and very often in a large degree officered by inexperienced men who would naturally waste more blanks than an instructed officer would require for his use.

A still greater cause of the increase in the cost of printing is the increase of the cost of paper, of labor, and of all the materials entering into printing. Paper has been two and a half prices; I suppose paper is now about double what it was before the war, and it has been three times more than it was before the war. The same is also true with all the materials for binding, although the Government has not suffered so much as might have been apprehended from this cause because the contracts have been made at very low rates by the Superintendent, and, as all his contracts have been made with men reliable and men of high reputation, and they have fulfilled their contracts in the most honorable manner at considerable loss to themselves.

The Senator from Indiana spoke of a time when the printing was $200,000 a year. I do not know when that was. The average cost of the printing of the Thirty-Third, Thirty-Fourth, and Thirty-Fifth Congresses, the three last Congresses under the contract system, was $374,000 a year. That was for the Senate and House of Representatives alone—the printing, paper, and binding. The whole printing now for the Senate and House of Representatives and for all the Executive Departments is not $2,000,000; in round numbers it is $1,750,000—a little less than that. Now, sir, let us see how much of that is the printing of Congress. The first item is for the War Department, $484,000. That is something more than a quarter of the whole.

Mr. CONNESS. Of course that belongs to this period of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly, it will not be continued; but for the present year it will cost a great deal on account of the mustering out of so many men. It is not an annual expenditure but it goes in to make up the $1,750,000 which is called two millions.

The next great item is the Treasury Department; that is $264,000. The printing of the Treasury Department, of course, must be immensely greater for a revenue of four or five hundred millions, drawn from every department of industry and almost every department of life, going in and counting a man's silver spoons and requiring returns of them, than it was for an income of $80,000,000 drawn from customs. This item of $261,000, instead of diminishing will doubtless increase, because the internal revenue increases, and as the southern States are becoming objects of taxation a large amount of printing will be required for the revenue officers there, for, I believe, whatever differences of opinion may exist about admitting the southern States to a share in the representation, the blackest Republican does not mean to deny them the blessings of taxation. The printing for this Department, therefore, instead of diminishing will increase.

Another item is the Post Office Department, which is more than $100,000. The Department of Agriculture is $45,000; the Judiciary is $28,000; the Interior Department is the modest sum of $25,000. All of these sums I have no reason to doubt are necessary and the amount is economically expended. This reduces the cost for Congress alone, for the two Houses, for the printing, paper, and binding, to $690,000. The cost for the same items for the Thirty-Third, Thirty-Fourth, and Thirty-Fifth Congresses was $374,000 a year. Six hundred and ninety thousand dollars to-day will not do as much printing as $374,000 would then, nothing like it, and the reason why we can do for $690,000 now what required only $374,000 then is because it is done now much more economically. There was a large profit to the contractors in the smaller item, and there is none in the larger item.

Take the printing alone, leaving out the paper and the binding, of which the prices have risen enormously—the amount now paid for the Senate is $50,000, against $67,000 six years ago, and the amount for the House of Representatives is $75,000, against $125,000 six years ago, the average of the six years preceding the establishment of the Government Printing Office. The whole printing now of both Houses of Congress, leaving out the paper and the binding, the printing alone is $125,311 46, against $192,782 49 under the old system, when everything was a great deal cheaper than it is now, showing a saving of over twenty-five per cent.

No such documents are printed now as the Pacific Railroad Reports, the Japan Expedition, and the Mexican Boundary Survey. The Mexican Boundary Survey Report cost $80,000, and the Pacific railroad publication cost three quarters of a million. I do not know what the Japan expedition volumes cost, but the money that was expended on these three publications would have placed a good library in every congressional district in the United States.

The Treasury blanks, which are printed at the public Printing Office, I think might be printed more economically elsewhere, for printing is very high here, but there is a particular reason for having them all printed here. It is very desirable that the blanks should be identical; it is very desirable for the detection of errors and frauds that the returns which are made to the Treasury Department should be precisely the same, such as the clerks are familiar with looking over, all over the country, and many of them are printed in duplicate, one set being bound in the Department and the other set sent out, and when the returns come in it requires less clerical labor for the examination, and the examination can be conducted with a great deal more accuracy, and gives much better opportunities for authenticating the returns.

I have made these remarks, Mr. President, because I did not wish to see Congress laboring under the imputation of great extravagance where it has really induced important economy. I need not say after these remarks that I consider the establishment of a Government Printing Office as a very economical arrangement for the Government. I tremble to think what would be the bills brought in upon us if all this printing was done now by contract, if we were at the mercy of contractors for the printing of the various blanks and forms that have been made necessary during the war, the prices of which could not be stipulated for in advance; and I should not do justice to my own feelings and to a very faithful officer if I did not say that I think the Superintendent of Public Printing is one of the most economical, careful, and faithful officers that I ever came in contact with. His whole object is to reduce the expenditures of his department as much as possible, and to reduce the amount of printing ordered by Congress, constantly persuading us to do it, and also to print the executive work at the lowest price that is compatible with its accuracy and with the efficiency of the public service. The printing is done now a great deal better than it ever was before and a great deal cheaper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following resolution, and to ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the number of copies heretofore ordered of the Reports of the Patent Office for the years 1863 and 1864 be reduced from ten thousand of each to four thousand of each.

Mr. CLARK. I think that had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would make one suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire. The whole number will have to be printed pretty soon, if at all. The resolution, the Senator is aware, is to reduce the number from ten thousand to four thousand, and the work is now upon the press, and unless the reduction is made now the Superintendent will be obliged to go on; therefore I shall call it up to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that I am opposed to it, but I think I would like to talk with the Senator a little about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well. I have no objection to let it go over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) for the relief of Joseph R. Morris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 268) to prevent and punish the manufacture and use of false, forged, or counterfeited brands, stamps, and stencils; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) to provide for the erection of fire-proof buildings at the Schuylkill arsenal, near Philadelphia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 68) providing for a change of name of certain forts and Government works; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 269) to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say, in connection with the fact that I introduce that bill, that it has been drawn at the Navy Department, and is accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which I desire to have printed and laid on the tables of Senators in connection with the bill. I desire further to say that I do not feel myself committed to the provisions of the bill which I have submitted, but I have presented it to the Senate for its consideration in compliance with the request of the Secretary of the Navy. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 270) securing to non-resident litigants the benefit of the jurisdiction of the United States courts, in the States lately in rebellion, in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to the Senate that I desire to take up this resolution to-morrow morning. It is a very important matter, and is based on facts that have just come to my knowledge from the Interior Department.

LAKE PORTAGE SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 193, which was originally reported from the Committee on Commerce, considered at length in the Senate, and then referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who have reported it back in a new draft. The amendment only need be read, because it is a substitute for the original bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 193) to amend an act entitled "An act granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior," approved March 3, 1865.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands be read instead of the original bill, and that order will be taken unless some Senator asks for the reading of the original bill.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Michigan, to aid in the building of a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, in addition to a former grant for that purpose, approved March 3, 1865, two hundred thousand acres of land in the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan, and from land to which the right of homestead or preemption has not attached: Provided, That one hundred and fifty thousand acres of said lands shall be selected from alternate odd-numbered sections, and fifty thousand acres from even-numbered sections of the lands of the United States. Said grant of lands shall inure to the use and benefit of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, in accordance with an act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, conferring the land granted to the said State, by the act hereby amended, on said company: And provided further, That the time allowed for the completion of said work and the right of reversion to the United States under the said act of Congress, approved March 3, 1865, be extended three additional years.

Mr. POMEROY. I notice that in the amendment as printed there is an omission of a proviso in regard to the mineral lands. It should have been in the amendment, but through some mistake it has been left out. I therefore move to amend the amendment by adding as an additional proviso the following:

Provided further, That no mineral lands shall be included within this grant.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator that he should define "the mineral lands" in inserting that clause; otherwise it would include all minerals.

Mr. POMEROY. In States like Michigan, where there never have been any precious metals, we have always confined ourselves to the use of the words "mineral lands;" but in those States where the precious metals are found, we designate the mineral lands as containing precious metals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be modified as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, and the question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. POMEROY. There is a clerical error in the eighteenth line of the amendment. The word "to" should be substituted for the word "on;" so as to read, "to said company."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, being merely a clerical mistake.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

A bill granting lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, in said State.

Mr. POMEROY subsequently said: I ask leave to enter a motion to reconsider the bill (S. No. 193) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior," approved March 3, 1865, which passed this morning during the morning hour. There is a mistake in the bill. I merely want to enter a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be entered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans;

A bill (H. R. No. 494) for the relief of Martha J. Willey; and

A bill (H. R. No. 495) for the relief of Mary A. Patrick.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the motion entered by me some time since to reconsider the vote by which the bill to admit Colorado into the Union was defeated.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate reconsider its vote rejecting the bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union?

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY answered to his name.

Mr. BROWN. If it is proposed that a reconsideration of this vote shall take place, as a matter of course or of courtesy I do not wish to contest such a course although doubting its propriety, but I do not wish any acquiescence on my part to be construed into an approval of the joint resolution in favor of the admission of Colorado with its present constitution. I was sick and absent in Philadelphia when the vote was taken on this proposition before, or I should have voted against it. As it is, if enabled to be present whenever the vote may again be taken, if it is to be reconsidered, I will unquestionably oppose it. The chief objection which I wish to state—not that there are no others—is that the constitution under which it claims admission contains a clause denying the right of suffrage to persons on account of color and race. I will never indorse by any vote of mine in this Senate any such odious discrimination, and as I propose to exercise my constitutional right in that behalf in regard to other States of the Union which have lately been in rebellion, so I am willing that the political reform, the assertion of this fundamental principle, should begin in the house of my friends, and apply first to the admission of Colorado.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will not reconsider that vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There has been an answer to the roll-call.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I think no answer was given.

Mr. BROWN. I voted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted twice; the Senator from Missouri once.

Mr. SUMNER. I was called out of the Senate for one minute, and during my absence this motion has been made; I do not know by whom.

Mr. WILSON. I made the motion. I did not know that my colleague was absent.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to address the Senate on the subject, I hope he will be allowed to do so by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAMSEY. He can do it just as well on the bill when it comes before us.

Mr. GRIMES. He has a right to do it on the motion to reconsider. The Secretary called the name of the Senator from Rhode Island and he answered before the Senator from Missouri rose to his feet to explain the vote he was about to give. The Senator from Missouri was permitted to give that explanation, and now I suppose the same courtesy might with equal propriety be extended to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri says his name was called and he answered.

Mr. GRIMES. So had the Senator from Rhode Island been called, and he answered before the Senator from Missouri's name was called.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I understand it, the Senator from Missouri was called, and when his name was called he rose and explained his vote.

Mr. GRIMES. He had no right to do that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps not if anybody had objected.

Mr. GRIMES. He was permitted to do it, and now the Senator from Massachusetts ought to have the same privilege.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Iowa desires to hear the Senator from Massachusetts, I shall not object. The rule of the Senate, I believe, has been, when there has been a response not to allow debate afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such is the rule of the Senate. After the call of the yeas and nays and a Senator answers, the rule of the Senate is that debate ceases. The Senator from Iowa, however, is right, in the opinion of the Chair, in point of fact, that the name of the Senator from Rhode Island had been called, and his answer was heard by the Chair. When the Senator from Missouri's name was called, he made a few words of explanation, no Senator objecting. The Chair then directed the call to proceed. The call again commenced, and the Senator from Rhode Island had answered, and simultaneously with his answer, or perhaps immediately after, the Senator from Massachusetts addressed the Chair and was recognized. If the point of order, however, is made, the Senator from Massachusetts, under the rule, is not entitled to be heard.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Chair decide that—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that any Senator makes the point of order objecting to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding. The Chair simply stated that if the point of order should be made, the Senator from Massachusetts would not be entitled, under the rule, to be heard. According to the practice, however, which has been adopted in the case of the Senator from Missouri, the Senator would be entitled; but still no point of order was made then. The Chair did not feel called upon to enforce the rule as against the Senator saying a few words of explanation, and he would not now as against the Senator from Massachusetts, and does not understand that any one now makes the point of order. The Chair therefore recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I hear Senators about me say, "Make your speech after the motion to reconsider has been adopted." I have no speech to make, but I wish to meet this question on the threshold, frankly and sincerely, with my most earnest protest. I feel that the Senate will make a great mistake if they proceed to reconsider this vote. The question was amply discussed on a former occasion; it was considered in every possible aspect. The condition of the Territory of Colorado was exposed; its want of population was exhibited, and its constitution having in it the word "white" was also exhibited to the Senate. On those grounds I felt it my duty then to oppose the admission of that Territory as a State into this Union. I opposed it then as earnestly as I could, believing it my duty as a Senator; fully satisfied that it would have been a fatal mistake for us to admit it. Having acted as I did then, I feel that I should be untrue to myself if I let slip any opportunity to resist the effort to introduce this Territory into the Union at this time, and under the present circumstances of the case. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not proceed to reconsider the vote that, to their honor, they have already recorded. They did well when, on a former occasion, after a two days' debate, by a large vote they deliberately refused to receive this Territory into the Union. Has anything occurred since to cause a change of opinion? Is there any new evidence? Are there any new facts? Is there anything which can change your responsibilities or which can make you see your duty in a new light? Has that constitution been amended? Has the word "white" been struck out of it? Why, sir, at this moment the most important practical question before the country is, whether we shall allow the word "white" to be in the constitutions of the late rebel States. Sir, with what just weight can you insist that the word "white" shall be excluded from those constitutions when you yourself deliberately receive into the Union a new State which has that principle of exclusion? I say, therefore, for the sake of my country, for the sake of public tranquillity, for the sake of those fundamental principles on which so much depends, and which, whether as Senator or citizen, I can never forget—I appeal to you, sir, and to my associates on this floor, not to allow this question to be revived. Let Colorado wait at least until she recognizes the Declaration of Independence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 238.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have a vote on this question, and I move to pass over that bill for a short time.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection if we can come to a vote immediately on this matter, but I do not want the special order to lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally if there be no objection.

Mr. COWAN. I hope not. This is an important question, and it has not been discussed by everybody.

Mr. WILSON. Well, let it pass over.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the special order be passed by informally for the purpose of allowing us to finish this motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to an informal postponement, it will require a motion to postpone the special order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to postpone the present and all prior orders in order to continue the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote on the bill for the admission of Colorado.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Senators who are so anxious that Colorado should be admitted will allow this measure to go over until there can be a fuller Senate than there is to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I propose that it shall go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan makes a motion to postpone the present and all prior orders.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the motion. Let it go over.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 288) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 8, 1863, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NYE. I think when we adjourned yesterday we were upon the naval bill, and I had the floor upon that question.

Mr. CONNESS. This was a subsequent arrangement.

Mr. NYE. I did not hear it.

Mr. CLARK. I called up the bill to make it a special order. That was the very object of moving to take it up, and then to adjourn.

Mr. NYE. That was a very sharp thing.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all sharp. It is the usual practice of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. I move to lay that order of business aside, and take up the bill relating to the iron-clads.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will not be done; let us not lay aside this public business for what may be considered the private business of individuals.

Mr. NYE. That is important public business, relative to the construction of the iron-clads.

Mr. CLARK. This is a matter of a great deal of importance. I understand that in one State there are some three thousand suits which are to be reached by this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the bill referred to by him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. The bill which the Senator from New Hampshire calls up is one of public importance and one of urgency. I think my friend from Nevada himself, when he knows what the bill is—his attention has not been turned to it—will consent that it shall come up. It is a bill to protect loyal men from prosecutions and suits for acts done in obedience to orders in putting down the rebellion. There are at this time, I understand, several thousand suits pending against loyal men who have committed no offense and done no act except in obedience to orders of superior officers. They are now being sued and prosecuted in the courts of Kentucky and other States, and this is a bill which has passed the House of Representatives and is of a public character; and it is due to the men who hazarded their all to save the country that we should protect them from prosecutions and suits for simply doing their duty. I hope that we shall go on with it.

Mr. NYE. At this point I should like to have the question of priority established a little. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] when I had the floor on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to the bill in relation to the contractors for iron-clads, moved that that question be laid aside until to-morrow (to-day) at one o'clock, to which I consented. Afterward, as the Senate was about to adjourn, the Senator from New Hampshire slipped in this bill. I merely want to learn what the practice is, that hereafter I may avail myself of it if I desire to get priority. I supposed that when the Senate made an order that the naval bill should go over until to-day at one o'clock, it meant what it had said.

Mr. CLARK. I do not quite like the expression of the Senator from Nevada that I had slipped the bill in, implying that I had done it for the purpose of defeating his bill. The Senate will remember that the Senator from Ohio made the motion to postpone the navy bill, the bill which was under consideration, and to proceed to the consideration of the bill chartering a company for the sewerage of this city. He moved to postpone the navy bill until one o'clock to-day, but it was not made a special order, and if it had been made a special order the unfinished business would override that special order.

Mr. NYE. That is what I want to learn.

Mr. CLARK. The Senate will bear me out in the assertion that when I moved to take up this bill the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] said, "You are not going further, Mr. CLARK;" and I said that I wanted to take up the bill so that it might be in order for to-morrow, (to-day), and the Senate thereupon took it up and put it in order for this time. There is no "slipping" about it. It is the deliberate order of the Senate taking up the bill at that time.

Mr. NYE. You slipped me.

Mr. CLARK. But it is before the Senate in its order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. CLARK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Doolittle, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Sumner, Nye, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Edmunds, Foster, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, McDougall, Morrill, Norton, Saulsbury, Wilson, and Wright—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

The Senate accordingly resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. NYE to the amendment of Mr. GRIMES.

The amendment of Mr. GRIMES was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert in lieu of the words to be stricken out the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several parties the awards made in their favor by the naval board organized under the resolution of the Senate adopted March 9, 1865, the awards being made under date of December 23, 1865, and reported to the Secretary of the Navy; Provided, That the payment shall not, in any case, exceed twelve per cent. upon the contract price, except in the case of the Camanche, in which case the award shall be paid in full.

The amendment of Mr. NYE to this amendment was to strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in calling the attention of the Senate to this bill by the motion just made, I did not intend to press it in advance of any other more important measure; but I deem it quite important to the country, and especially important to these contractors, that they should know as soon as possible the exact condition in which they are to stand.

A little more than a year ago this Senate adopted a resolution authorizing and directing the Navy Department of the Government to appoint three competent persons to ascertain the actual cost to the contractors of the vessels and steam machinery that had been accepted by the Government. I assumed then that the Senate conceded one point, that by authorizing the board to do that duty they conceded that the Government were at least equitably bound to pay the actual cost of these vessels and machinery to the contractors. In introducing that resolution I had no other object in view than to ascertain the exact cost of these vessels and the machinery, so that at this present session of Congress the subject could be acted on understandingly. We assumed, of course, that the Department would appoint such a board as in all of its constituent parts would make a perfect whole to ascertain that fact; and we rested upon that supposition. They appointed that board and the board have reported. Their report has been the subject of investigation by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has said, received the careful consideration of the sub-committee to which it was referred. They came to the conclusion that it was no more than an act of justice on the part of this Government to pay to the contractors the actual cost of the labor they had performed.

Sir, it seems to me in all its phases to be eminently just. The whole system of this mode of naval construction was new. The Government itself knew very little about it, and the contractors as little as the Government. But an absolute necessity existed for the construction of these ships; the necessities of the Government were such that, cost what they might, it must have them, and the ships have answered well the end for which they were constructed. I think I can say in truth that there is no class of men who have been engaged on Government contracts that have displayed a nobler spirit of self-sacrifice and patriotism to the Government than those men who vied with each other to see who could construct the best and most efficient vessels-of-war. At any rate the Government had determined to have this class of ships, and made its contracts for them in 1862 and 1863, and from that time until the period of their completion the reasons are ample and very clearly set forth why there must of necessity have been a great increase in the cost of the work. The Government acknowledged this. The Government acknowledged that it did not know itself what it did want and was constantly retarding the work on these ships by alterations from the specifications in the contracts.

It is patent to us all that from 1862 to 1864 not only the price of labor, but of every material which enters into the construction of a ship, almost doubled in cost. So accurate were the board that had this matter under investigation, that they required of these contractors that they should give the price of labor per hour during every month that they were engaged in the construction of these ships. Upon that point there is no question that the statements rendered are true and perfectly reliable; they come to the Committee on Naval Affairs certified by the president of the board as correct and true.

The Senate will bear in mind that these contractors were invited and required to appear, not before a tribunal of their own choosing, not before a tribunal where they had the opportunity of even choosing one member; but the Government itself fixed the tribunal, and required and demanded the presence of these contractors before that board, in compliance with the resolution that the Senate had adopted.

Then, sir, there are two things which the Government had done. The Senate had passed the resolution, and the Navy Department had acted under that resolution. A board was organized, and before it these men were required to appear. That board was diligent in its business, and sat from June until December, and it required these contractors to come before it and present their claims. Was the Government in earnest with these contractors, or was it trifling with them? Was this all to go for naught and the judgment of the board to be reversed and the Senate of the United States to sit as a court of appeals for the purpose of reversing the judgment of the board appointed by the Government itself? Sir, the committee to which this subject was referred felt that our inquiries need go no further than to ascertain what was the actual cost of these vessels. To ascertain that, a board of inquiry had been sitting for five months, and we took the report of that board as evidence of the cost of these ships. It seems to me that that is just. When a poor mechanic or contractor has gone on to do work for the Government, and has, as my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] said yesterday, involved not only all his own fortune but the fortune of his friends in the construction of these ships, and when the Government by a tribunal of its own has declared that the cost of these ships was so much, it seems to me that the Government is estopped from going back of the judgment of the tribunal of its own selection.

Sir, are we to be told that this Government is too poor to be just? Are we to be told here that this tribunal had not sufficient ability to determine what the cost of these ships was? I have observed that whenever a tribunal is appointed by this Government to ascertain what is due from the Government it is exceedingly exacting, exceedingly careful, and it is very rarely that a mistake is made in giving the applicant or contractor more than he ought to receive. I approve of that care and of that scrutiny, but I assert that when a judgment is rendered in favor of a claimant this Government should be controlled by it.

The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] always careful, always vigilant, and exceedingly scrutinizing, denounced this as an omnibus bill. Sir, here are just as many bills as there were double-enders and iron-clads that were accepted by this Government. He fears that an unjust bill is to be carried through on the back of just bills. In answer to that, let me say there is no greater probability of there being danger of one bill helping another, in the bill as it is presented, than though there were forty separate bills. I therefore dismiss that suggestion made by the Senator with that simple explanation.

The Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, proposes to give these contractors twelve per cent. in addition to their contract price. I do not think that that mode of relief is as just as the other; I do not believe that it will be as equitable to all these parties, and for this reason: by that proposition some will get more, perhaps, than they would get under the award as it has been rendered, and some will get greatly less. Some will get more than they ought to have, and others will get less than they ought to have. It seems to me that when the amount which is due these contractors for the actual cost of their work is ascertained, that is the exact measure of justice which the Government ought to mete out to them in a spirit of magnanimity.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is mistaken as to my amendment. As the amendment is drawn they cannot get more than the award; but where the award is more than twelve per cent. they get the twelve per cent. If the award is less than twelve per cent., they will get the amount of the award, whatever that may be.

Mr. NYE. Then I understand the Senator to say that the award may be less than he proposes to give.

Mr. GRIMES. The award is less than twelve per cent. in several instances. In those instances, under my substitute, if adopted, the parties will only get the amount of the award, which may be two per cent. or five per cent.; but in the other cases where the award exceeds twelve per cent., those contractors will get the twelve per cent.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for his explanation; it simply shows that, after all, he puts great confidence in this award as being right, and I assume that there is no other basis that can be right as between these contractors and the Government but that resting upon the award of this tribunal constituted by the Government itself. It is therefore that I object to the amendment, but if that mode of relief is to prevail—and I know the power of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and feel great embarrassment in attempting to go against anything that he desires—if that must be guarded as he says the amendment is, "that no person shall receive more than the amount of the award in any case and shall be paid by a percentage, I insist upon it that my amendment should prevail, to insert "fifteen" instead of "twelve" per cent. If the representations of these contractors are to be relied upon, their sufferings in a pecuniary and financial point of view have been very great. They have subjected themselves to large payments of interest, have had many anxious hours and days in regard to it, involving their friends' property in the issue. It seems to me that upon every principle of justice this Government ought to pay the contractors the actual cost of the work done by them.

This is not an isolated case, or one peculiar to our own Government. I have taken occasion, since this question came up, to examine a little into the proceedings of the English Government at the time of the Crimean war. They needed vessels of a different kind from those which had been usually employed, and the rule they adopted where contracts were made in a hurry, not knowing what the additional cost would be resulting from the necessity of speedy construction, was to pay the contractor the cost. Can this Government or its representatives afford to see the grand crash that will be made in individual fortunes, rather than step up and say that the contractors shall receive what the labor and materials actually cost them? A man would hardly be tolerated to live as a good citizen in a neighborhood who would get a contract which was oppressive and ruinous on his neighbor and so use it as to crush him; and surely this nation can afford to be as magnanimous as individual is to individual.

But we are told by the Senator from Iowa that this is only the beginning of the end, that there are other claims. I have not taken occasion to investigate that fact; I have not thought it material. If this claim rests upon the principles of equity and justice, and there are other claims resting upon the same foundation, this nation, in view of its own dignity, in view of its own sense of justice, ought to meet them. Our Navy is not a thing of a day. It has done more to defend our national honor and our national integrity and has given a more noble exhibition of our national genius and enterprise than any other arm of the service used during the war; and it has made old England sing in subdued accents that she is mistress of the sea. From the day that the little Monitor went down to Hampton Roads and sank the rebel craft, or so shattered her that she had to take herself back to her moorings, the character of the American Navy has attracted the admiration of the world. I believe sincerely that these contractors have tried to do the best they could, not for their own advantage, but for their country's glory, and to establish the fact that the character of the American Navy that was being built had more in it than any other navy that had ever been built.

Now, sir, we have this Navy, and I submit to the Senate, I submit to the country, whether it is not worth all that it has cost. I care not, sir, what its cost may be; we have a Navy now that admonishes the world that we are prepared for offensive and defensive warfare with a naval force such as no other country can boast. Much of the credit of this achievement is due to the noble patriotism and magnanimity of the contractors who built these ships, and they will stand as a monument to the genius of American skill and enterprise when those who are talking about them to-day will have been forgotten.

Sir, I insist upon it that the report of the board is the fairer, truer, and less liable to mistake than the proposition submitted by the Senator from Iowa in his amendment; but if that basis must be surrendered, if that proposition, mathematically certain, must be given up, I insist upon it that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa should be amended by inserting fifteen per cent. instead of twelve per cent. These contractors have given the cost of every nail and spike and bolt. The cost of every item in the construction of the vessels, from the laying of the keel to their completion, is here before us. I am unwilling that this Government should say to them, "Notwithstanding it cost you so much, we will give you a portion only of what the work cost you." If you adopt the principle that the Government is liable and should be held responsible to any extent, the whole ground is yielded. If the contractors are entitled to anything, they are entitled to what the work cost. Either reject the entire principle and say you will not pay at all, or give them the actual cost of the work. I appeal to the magnanimity of the Senate, the representative of the great nation whose Navy this is, not to send these men beggarly away, and let not the only return they get for their patriotism and energy be an expression of ingratitude from the representatives of the people of this country.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to put a question to the Senator from Nevada in reference to the basis on which this claim is made. Were not the contracts regularly made with each one of the firms mentioned in this bill, for the construction of these iron-clads, and were not the prices fixed by the contracts; and where does it appear that the Government of the United States is bound either in law or on principles of honor to pay them more than was required by their contracts? I understand that the object of this bill is to supply deficiencies of that kind, and to indemnify contractors who claim that the work cost them more than the contract price. I wish some information on this subject from the honorable Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NYE. These contracts were made in 1862 and 1863, at a time when labor was at a given price. The vessels were to be completed within a certain time specified in the contract; but the Government admits the fact, and it is shown in the report, that for various reasons by the operation of governmental direction they were retarded in their work, and much of it was not completed until 1864, when the price of almost every article they had to use had doubled.

Mr. HOWARD. Did not the contractors themselves contemplate that this delay might be produced by the direction of the Government, and had the contractors therefore any ground to complain of the delay produced in that manner?

Mr. NYE. When they contracted to build a ship in a hundred and fifty days or a hundred and twenty days, I take it they did not understand that the Government was to change the model, change the machinery, or to order such alterations as would require more than the time prescribed in the contract for the performance of the original work, to make the alterations, as it appears in this report was done in a number of instances. Five hundred thousand dollars worth of extra work was done on one vessel.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I understand from the Senator from Nevada that the Government insisted on some fundamental changes in their mode of construction.

Mr. NYE. In a large number of cases.

Mr. HOWARD. Necessarily increasing the cost of the work.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if that was not in all cases paid for.

Mr. NYE. The extra work was paid for; but the time it took to do the extra work was as great as the contract time for doing the whole work.

Mr. SHERMAN. Still all the increased cost on account of the extra work was paid for, as I understand.

Mr. NYE. I understand so, except in one case; but that does not change the principle. The point is that time was essential, and that every month that rolled around increased the cost of doing the work. On one ship extra work to the amount of $500,000 was ordered, which took more time to perform than it would have required to make the original construction. The question of time is important in two views. The price of labor by the hour doubled and the cost of materials almost doubled. Almost all the materials which they had necessarily to use advanced in price from seventy-five to one hundred per cent. In another case, as appears by the report, the contractors did not receive the draft for the machinery until after the contract time for the completion of the work had expired, and as the Department say in the letter to them, it was owing to the hurry of business in the Department. In every one of these cases there is a reason rendered, and a reason that has been entirely satisfactory to the Navy Department. The Department accepted the work as evidence of their satisfaction. They took it when completed; and that is the highest evidence of their satisfaction with the work, both with regard to time and with regard to quality. Therefore the suggestion which the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] made yesterday falls to naught. It is not at all unusual, but usual, when ships-of-war go from here, and especially new ones, to the Pacific coast, to send them to the dry-dock on Mare Island to be overhauled and repaired.

Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate, or to keep the more important measure, as it is deemed, of the Senator from New Hampshire from being acted on. I have only to say that the report in this case was carefully drawn and is the result of mature deliberation by the sub-committee. If the Senate, after the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, proposes to pay a percentage, I think it ought to pay at least fifteen per cent. upon the contract price. If the figuring of my distinguished friend from Iowa is correct, and I have observed that he never figures so as to pay out very much money, fifteen per cent. will give almost a million dollars less than the board reported that the work cost the contractors. It seems to me that a million less ought to satisfy the Government. If such a reflection is at all sweet, I think the reflection that it has had and is now enjoying the benefit of more than a million dollars hard earned by days of toil and anxiety ought to satisfy the most voracious. If it is required here, under the lead of my distinguished friend from Iowa, that these men shall contribute a million, let that suffice; but I insist upon it that he shall not by his twelve per cent. proposition take half a million more from them which their families and their own interests require that they should have. I submit to the justice of the Senate that when it is shown by figures that the Government have reaped where they did not sow, to the amount of $1,000,000, that ought to satisfy at least a sensible, honorable body of men who take justice for their standard and equity as their rule.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I have difficulties about this bill on two points. It is avowed here as a rule that we are to pay the cost of this work, though it exceeds the contract price. Are we to establish the precedent that nobody that contracts with the Government is to lose; that Congress will make up any loss? That is a pretty broad precedent to make, particularly at this time, or, indeed, at any time. Another question involved is that you guaranty by this action the value of the currency, or in other words you guaranty them against the increase of war prices during the time they are fulfilling their contracts.

I should not like the Senate to establish either of these principles, that the contractors with the Government of the United States are to be paid the cost of their work without regard to the contract price, or that they are to be indemnified for the depreciation of the currency and against the increase of war prices. All that is embraced in the resolution that was passed by the Senate at the heel of the session last year, authorizing the Department to form this board to pass upon the cost of the vessels. If I was making laws to last for all time to govern a people, I would make no such rules and regulations. I have been, to a limited extent, engaged in public works; and my experience has been that there is a difference in the talent, ingenuity, and skill of contractors. One man or one set of contractors will do their work, pay all their hands, and make money, and upon the same description of work and at the same prices another set will fall short and not be able to pay their hands, and fail in the end. Why is this? It is on account of the superior energy and skill of some, their power of combination, and their ability to apply their means to the end in view, the accomplishment of the work. If I can understand these reports, that has been the case in some of these contracts. Under precisely the same circumstances some have complained of no losses and others have complained of pretty heavy losses.

Now, we know what ship-builders are, as well as what they should be. Give them the dimensions of a ship, and the character of the vessel, and they know what quantity of timber is needed; they know what iron is necessary and the amount of labor necessary to accomplish it. They can make their estimate of what it will cost them, and allow for a fair profit, including their capital in machinery and in the investment; and as intelligent men they do make their estimates and their bids accordingly. We know the immense fortunes that some of these ship-builders have made, and yet we know that there are others who fail, and so it is in all the avocations of life. Men of skill, energy, and judgment are the prosperous men; men who lack skill, lack energy, and lack judgment are the men who fail in the affairs of this world.

Now, sir, I am unwilling (and that is my difficulty about this bill) to make the rule that this Government is to answer for whatever a contract may cost the individual to accomplish the work, without regard to the contract price. They are sagacious men; they make their calculations upon the character of the currency and the chances of its depreciation. They know the effect of war and how it changes prices; and that, too, if they are fit for their avocations, enters into their calculations when they bid. I believe all these specifications required them to make additions and alterations before the completion of the work; and that was within their contemplation at the time they made these contracts. It may be true, and no doubt is true, that they have been delayed by these alterations, by the large additional work that was required to be done; but for this additional work they were paid under the contracts. They may not have been paid for all the delays, all the damages that were done them. They could not have foreseen the extent of this additional work. They may have supposed the designers of these vessels understood their business and had made the designs carefully, and that the alterations would be but small and immaterial. An alteration that would cost an additional $500,000 certainly was not within the contemplation of any contractor, because it never should have been allowed by a Department that understood its business in relation to the building of vessels.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think there is force in his suggestion so far as regards ordinary contracts; but I think it is due to the Department to say, as is stated in this report, that the building of these ships was to some extent and almost altogether in this country an experiment, and the Department had to avail itself of all possible experience, and as improvements were found necessary they had to be made. Therefore I suggest to the Senator that it is not like the construction of a ship upon old plans, and I have not been able to see that even in the case to which he refers the Department was in fault.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, every special case that appeals to the Treasury, has its placebo, its excuse for failure. The building of iron vessels was no new thing—no new thing in America, no new thing in Europe. We are not to suppose that our officers made the plans without information as to how far the science had progressed in other countries. I do not impeach them with any such want of judgment and skill as to suppose that they went on blundering ignorantly without knowing what had been done in other countries.

I have no question in my own mind that most of these men have lost money; I think they have lost money, principally because of the alterations that were made; and I should be glad to have some criterion devised upon which I could vote for settling their bills, so that we might be done with them.

The difficulty I have is in coming up to the point that this Government is to establish now and forever the principle that no man who contracts with it is to lose, and that it is to act upon the principle hereafter that the contract price is not to be the rule of compensation. If the contractors then swell the cost of work that they have undertaken to perform, it is nothing to them. They will not care how high wages go, for Uncle Sam is to pay.

I will not agree to establish that principle; but still these men have suffered by the change of plans and the additional time required to do the original work, throwing them into more expensive times. I would be willing to furnish a criterion of compensation if I knew what it was. The chairman of the Naval Committee seems to fix upon twelve per cent.; the Senator from Nevada fixes it at fifteen per cent. I should like to have these bills settled at the one or the other, and that we should be done with them; but I beg you, gentlemen, not to establish the principle that a contractor with the Government is never to lose, let his work cost him what it will. Such a rule would not do in private life among individual citizens. In extraordinary cases of hardship or of difficulty, individuals, who are able to do so, compensate the contractor beyond the contract price. That is an appeal to his own sense of equity and justice on account of the misfortune of the man who has made the contract. But when we come to make general rules and declare the general principle that we are to compensate all these men, we take from them their interest in the result of their work and we are to pay the bills.

Allusion has been made to the depreciation of the currency, and that is urged as an argument in favor of this bill. Why, sir, there is no intelligent man but what takes that into consideration in making a contract. He estimates the cost and the hazards that he will incur. All those things are within his contemplation at the time. If you are going to make compensation for the difference between the contract price and the value of the money when it was paid, to all the soldiers who received your pay, to all the officials to whom you paid salaries, and to all the contractors who contracted to deliver to you on time all the supplies for the Army and Navy that have enabled this country to carry on the most stupendous war that has happened in our time, or that I hope ever will happen on the continent of America, it will be an endless and ruinous job, and you will never be done settling the cost of this war.

I do not wish to set up my judgment against the judgment of anybody. If it is the sense of the Senate that it should extend its hand to relieve the calamities of the contractors who have failed, be it so; but I have seen enough of this case to see that some of these parties have failed in the construction of precisely the same class of vessels in regard to which other parties have made no complaint, thus showing that the failure in the one case was owing to the want of skill and knowledge of the contractor and not to any fault of the Government. There is no period in the history of the nation, when you are carrying on a great war or great constructions and improvements, that this same thing will not happen—some will fail while others make money.

I felt bound to say this much on these few points. I am not willing to establish the rule that we will compensate every contractor for the cost of the work that he contracts to do, or that we will take into consideration the difference in the value of money and the value of labor during the whole period of the contract; but still, wherever the loss has been occasioned by the action of the Government in delaying the specifications or requiring additional work that could not have been fairly calculated upon when the contract was made, I think there is ground for equitable compensation, and I feel willing and ready to vote for it.

Mr. GRIMES. I only rise to set the Senator from Kentucky right in regard to one thing. I think, in the first place, that he is mistaken in supposing that so many of these cases are predicated upon the loss that has been sustained by the contractors in consequence of alterations made by the Navy Department. But the inference would be drawn from what he has said that the conduct of the Navy Department in the construction of these vessels was rather of a blundering character, and that they ought not to have directed changes to be made; and he says that these are not the first iron vessels that have been built; that they have been built before. That is true. Iron vessels have been built before; but no such vessels as we have built have been built before; and almost all of the attachments to these vessels have been compelled, necessarily, to be altogether of a different character from what was before known. In the first place, it required a great deal of time and ingenuity and a great many experiments in order to determine which was the best character of a rudder to apply to these monitors. Then there were constant changes made in order to obviate the defects which were found to exist in the original Monitor, so as to prevent the great overhanging which was doubtless the cause of the sinking of the original Monitor. Then it was exceedingly difficult to arrange the compass, and many experiments were made and considerable delay occasioned in consequence of the variation caused by the action of the iron on the deck of the vessel upon the compass. They finally devised a way of raising the compass on a high staff and having a card on which it could be read down in front.

If the Senator will go with me down here to the navy-yard I will show him two monitors, one of which was built in 1862, and another one built recently, the Tonawanda, and he would hardly suppose that the original Monitor that was built in 1862 was the prototype and original of the perfect vessel that is now lying at the wharf. These changes have been going on gradually. Every battle that has been fought, every storm that they have encountered, every experienced and capable man who has commanded one of them has made some suggestive changes, and where those changes have met the approval of the proper advising officers of the Navy Department, although a vessel might be upon the stocks, availing themselves of the clause in the contracts which authorized them to change the specifications of the contract, they have done so. Manifestly it was the interest and the duty of the Government to make such changes. I am happy to be able to say, and I think the Senator will concur with me if he has consulted with any naval gentlemen and entertains the same opinion with them, I am happy in being able to say, what is my own honest conviction, that we have to-day the most perfect iron vessels in the world; and they have all sprung out of a defective original vessel, and all been perfected through those changes which have been gradually going on in these various ship-yards, either private ship-yards or our own.

I rose, Mr. President, not for the purpose of controverting or entering into a discussion of the merits of this proposition, but simply not to let it be inferred that I acquiesced in what might possibly be drawn as a conclusion from the Senator's remarks, that I believed there had been any improper blundering in regard to these iron-clads. I know that the Navy Department have made mistakes, I know they made most egregious mistakes in regard to one class of vessels not included in this bill. I am not here to defend those mistakes; but I am here to defend every improvement and change that has been made toward making a perfect ship-of-war, which I think we have done.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am happy to agree with the Senator from Kentucky in the fundamental principle which he has laid down and developed so clearly. I agree with him that by no legislation of ours must we recognize the principle that contractors with the Government may never lose. The Senator cannot state that proposition too strongly. But I part company with him when he undertakes to apply the proposition to the present case. We agree on the proposition; we disagree on the application.

Had these contracts been in a period of peace, then there would have been occasion for the application of the proposition of the Senator; but they were not in a period of peace; they were in a period of war. The Senator himself has characterized the war as perhaps the greatest in all history. If they were not precisely in a period of war, they were in those early days which were the heralds of war. The practical question for us as legislators is, whether we can shut our eyes to that condition of things. The times were exceptional; and surely the remedy must be exceptional also.

I have said, had it been a moment of peace, then the Senator from Kentucky would be right, and we should not be justified in exercising the influence which we have over the public Treasury in opening it for the relief of these contractors. But, sir, war is a great disturbing force. What force in human society, what force in business, is more disturbing? Wherever it goes it not only carries with it death and destruction, but the derangement of business, the change of pursuits, the interference with the currency, and generally the dislocation of the common relations of life. You cannot be blind to such a condition of things. You must not shut your eyes to its consequences. If you do so you cannot do justice to the case that is now before you.

I repeat, therefore, did these contracts grow out of a period of peace I should not be here now to advocate them; but it is because they grew out of a period of war that I insist that those who have suffered by them shall enjoy that same justice which we are making haste to accord to all who have contributed to our success in that terrible war. Why, sir, how often do we plead in this Chamber for justice to all who have contributed to our success! It is my duty constantly to plead here for justice to those freedmen who have done so much and placed you under undying obligations. I hope I am not indifferent also to those national creditors who have supplied the means which helped your triumph; nor yet again to those soldiers, whether on land or sea, who have so powerfully served the national cause. But there is still another class, for whom no one has yet spoken on this floor, who have contributed to your success not less than the soldier or the creditor; I was almost about to say not less than the freedman; I mean the mechanics of this country. They, sir, have helped you to carry on this war to its victorious close. Without the mechanics where would you have been? What would have been your equipments on the land? Where would have been that marvelous navy on the sea? It was the skilled labor of this country, coming so promptly to the rescue, which gave you that power which carried you on from victory to victory.

Now, sir, the practical question is, whether these mechanics, who have done so much to turn the tide of battle, shall be losers by the skill, the labor, and the time which they devoted to your triumph? Tell me not, sir, that they acted according to their contract. To that I reply, the war disturbed that contract, and it is your duty here, sitting as a high court in equity, to review all the circumstances of the case and to see in what way the remedy may be fitly applied. You cannot turn away from the equities of the case. You cannot treat it literally and severely according to the precise terms of the contract. You must go into those vital considerations which arise out of the peculiar circumstances of the case.

There are several facts which are obvious to all. They have been alluded to already in this debate. A Senator on the other side of the Chamber has alluded to them. In the first place, there was the general increase in the price of labor and material that ensued after these contracts were made. Nobody doubts that. There was, then, in the second place, another fact somewhat connected with the first. I mean the change in the currency. There was, then, in the third place, what has been alluded to several times, the changes made in the models of these vessels at the Navy Department, which necessarily imposed upon these contractors additional expense and labor. Then there was another circumstance to which my attention has been directed latterly—I believe, however, the Senator from Iowa alluded to it yesterday—that at the moment of the war, when labor was the highest, when it was most difficult to obtain it, there came an order from the proper authorities exempting those who labored in the arsenals and public yards of the United States from enrollment. Of course all who were then working in private yards or with contractors, naturally, so far as they could, hurried under the national flag that they might become workmen there and thus obtain exemption from enrollment. I have here an order from the Navy Department which I believe has not yet been introduced into this debate, and which I will read. It is introduced by an order from the War Department, as follows:

[Circular No. 28.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1864.

Skilled mechanics and operatives employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy-yards of the United States who shall be drafted, and, on examination, held to service, will not be required to report for duty under such drafts so long as they remain in the aforesaid service, provided the officer in charge shall certify that their labor, as mechanics or operatives, is necessary for the naval or military service.

JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Then comes the supplementary order from the Navy Department, as follows:

In accordance with the provisions of the circular, should "skilled mechanics and operatives" employed in the yard be drafted, the commandant will certify to the Provost Marshal General that "their labor as mechanics or operatives is necessary for the naval" service. The exemption from military duty continues only so long as the drafted persons are employed in the navy-yard; and should either of them leave for any cause the fact will be immediately reported to the Provost Marshal General. The commandant will decide what operatives come within the provisions of the circular.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

TO COMMANDANTS OF NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What is the date of that?

Mr. SUMNER. "Navy Department, 13th of August, 1864."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Now, I should like to ask, at what time were these contracts given out for the building of these ships? In 1862, I believe.

Mr. SUMNER. In 1862 and 1863.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What proportion of the work, then, was done after the issuance of this order?

Mr. SUMNER. That I am not able to say.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We ought to know that, in order to see what effect that order is to have on our deliberations.

Mr. CLARK. Many of them were finished a year before that.

Mr. SUMNER. But I take it they were not all finished at that time. Surely they were not. This order illustrates very plainly the disturbing influence from the war; and this brings me again to press this point upon your attention. I mention certain particulars in which this appeared; but I wish to bring home to your minds the controlling consideration that we were in a time of war, vast in its proportions, and most disturbing in its influence. This alone is enough to account for the failure of these contractors to complete their contracts. We were not in a period of peace, and you err if you undertake to hold these contractors to all the austere responsibilities to which you might properly hold them in a period of peace.

The Senator from Kentucky said that they took the war into their calculations. Perhaps they did; but who among these contractors could take that war adequately into his calculations? Who among those sitting here or at the other end of the avenue properly appreciated the character of the great contest that was then coming on? Sir, we had passed half a century in peace; we knew nothing of war or of war preparations, when all at once we were called to efforts on this gigantic scale. Are you astonished that these contractors did not know more about the war than your statesmen? Be to these contractors as gentle in judgment and as considerate as you have been to others in public life who have erred in their calculations with regard to it.

I have said that the interest now in question was the great mechanical interest of the country. It is an interest, let me add, that is not local, as this bill is for the benefit of mechanics in all parts of the loyal States, from Maryland in the South to Massachusetts and Maine in the North and East, and then stretching from New York on the sea-board to Missouri beyond the Mississippi. I have here a list of the States interested, through different contractors, in this very bill. I will read it: Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, and even California. The interest for which I am now speaking crosses the mountains and goes to the Pacific ocean.

I said that this was the skilled labor of the country. What labor more valuable; what service, while the war was going on, more important! If these mechanics did not expose their persons in the peril of battle, they gave their skill to prepare others to achieve the victory. It was in ancient times that the oracle said to the city in danger, "Look to your wooden walls." The oracle in our country said, "Look to your iron-clads and your double-enders;" and these mechanics came forward and by their generous labor enabled you to put those iron-clads and double-enders on the ocean, and thus to secure the final triumph. The building of that invulnerable navy was one of the great victories of the war, not to be commemorated on any special field, but to be seen in those mighty results which we all now enjoy.

And now again I ask, are you ready to see these contractors who have done this service sacrificed? You do not allow the soldier to be sacrificed, nor the national creditor who has taken your stock. Will you allow the mechanic to be sacrificed? There are many of them who, without your help, must suffer. One of the most enterprising and faithful in the whole country is a constituent of my own, who during the last year has been obliged to go into bankruptcy from his inability to meet liabilities growing out of the war, and at this moment he finds no chance of relief except in what a just Government may return to him. My friend on my right [Mr. Nye] asked you to be magnanimous to these contractors. I do not put it in that way. I ask you simply to be just. Do by them as you would be done by.

The Senator from Nevada also very fitly reminded you of the experience of other countries. He told you that England, at the close of the Crimean war, when her mechanics had suffered precisely as your mechanics have suffered, did not allow them to be sacrificed, but every pound and shilling of all their liabilities under their contracts was promptly met by that Government. Will you be less just to your mechanics than England? It is an old saying that republics are ungrateful. I hope that this Republic may certainly vie with any monarchy in gratitude to those who have served it. You have shown great energy in meeting your enemies. I ask you to show a commensurate energy in doing justice to those who have contributed to your success.

Now, sir, the practical question remains, what shall be paid? I, of course, shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nevada raising the percentage in the proposition of the Senator from Iowa to fifteen per cent; but I am free to say that does not satisfy me. I prefer the report of the committee, and I will tell you precisely why. I prefer it because it is founded on the judgment of a court. I do not use the language hastily. I say it is founded on what for practical purposes may be called the judgment of a court. It was by a resolution of this body that a commission was constituted of honorable gentlemen having the confidence of the country, one of them an eminent commodore in the Navy; another a paymaster, and another an engineer; three gentlemen who from their education and position were supposed to be peculiarly competent to deal with such matters, and to them these cases were submitted. They sat as a tribunal for months; they listened to all the evidence that was brought before them; and you have now before you their final judgment. They were a court of claims created by yourselves to deal with these cases.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the board was constituted for this purpose:

"To inquire into and determine how much the vessels-of-war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work."

They were organized for the purpose of ascertaining just what the cost was, not concerning the question whether it ought to be allowed or not. It was a mere question of dollars and cents, a matter of figures. It does not touch the question whether we should make the allowance that they report.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not pretend to say—I hope my friend will understand me—that their report is, technically, in the form of a judgment of a court; but I do submit that under the circumstances of the case it is to be taken by us as of similar value. It is the finding of a tribunal created to consider this very question. Sir, do we not almost every day act on the judgment of the Court of Claims, sitting in another part of this building? We accept their deliberations, and do not undertake to open their judgments, except in rare cases. I do not mean to say that the Senate may not open the judgment of the Court of Claims, nor do I say they may not, if they choose, open the finding of this tribunal which has been constituted under a resolution of the Senate; but I submit that you have before you a proper authority for your conclusion, and I ask you, why go behind their report, especially when that report is commended by the Navy Department itself, and by the Naval Committee of the Senate?

The case seems to me to be unanswerable; it is impregnable. I put it, first, on the ground of original equity, growing out of the abnormal condition of war; in the second place, I put it upon the ground that it has been heard and considered by a tribunal practically of your own selection; and I may add, in the third place, that all this has been admitted and recognized by a committee of your body. I hope you will not hesitate to do justice.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts is perfectly familiar with this report, and as I know but little about it I rise merely for the purpose of getting some information in order to guard myself in my vote. I desire to ask him if the board constituted under the resolution of the Senate heard any evidence whatever beyond that which was presented by the contractors themselves. I call his attention to the minutes of the board:

"The board, after a critical examination of the bills of cost presented by the several contractors for vessels and steam machinery contracted for in the years 1862 and 1863, who have appeared and made sworn statements, has determined the excess of cost in the several cases, over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, to be as follows."

The minutes of their proceeding do not show that they heard any testimony whatever except that which was brought by the contractors themselves, the bills of cost which they presented and which they swore were the bills that entered into the construction of these vessels. I ask the Senator if he has any information on that subject, whether they were authorized, or whether they did take other testimony than that which was presented to them? I suppose they were authorized to do so.

Mr. SUMNER. I will say to my friend that I have no information beyond what appears in the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, there was other evidence taken by the board. What was the entire evidence before the board is not communicated in the record of the board, but in reading the record of the board I find that there was additional evidence to that of the contractors themselves taken.

Mr. HENDERSON. Upon what points?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Upon the character and cost of the work.

Mr. HENDERSON. By whom were the witnesses suggested?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The board took the testimony of naval constructors. I believe they are officers in the Navy.

Mr. CLARK. I will inquire if there was anybody else examined besides these constructors and officers connected with the Navy?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand these constructors to be contractors. They are officers of the Navy.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly, I understand that; but I do not find in looking over the report that anybody beyond those were summoned as witnesses.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not prepared just now to say that there was anybody beside these naval constructors.

Mr. CLARK. I do not see any in the report.

Mr. HENDERSON. Although my friend from Massachusetts has made a very earnest speech in favor of allowing these claims, and from which I was very much struck with the merit (as I supposed) of the claims, yet he seems not to be perfectly conversant with the whole case. I think he is rather generous on this occasion, and jumps at the conclusion that these contractors are entitled to something too readily. It springs, however, from his magnanimous and generous nature, I think. I desire, therefore, to ask the Senator from Indiana, who seems to have given attention to this subject, whether these contractors contracted for other vessels than those named in this report of the committee during the existence of the war between 1861, the time of its commencement, and 1865, the time of its close.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that the board has given us no evidence upon that question; but I understand that some of these contractors did construct other vessels, and some did not. For instance, I understand that the Messrs. Secor constructed either four or five vessels, I do not know which, and their claim here is for three. I did hear, though from no authentic source, that Messrs. Eads & Co., of St. Louis, did some other work for the Government beyond that mentioned in this bill, but what that work was I do not know.

Mr. HENDERSON. My reason for asking the question springs from the fact that I noticed in the report that Mr. James B. Eads, of St. Louis, who deserves a great deal of credit for his industry and energy in the construction of vessels in the early part of the war, is allowed by this board for constructing the Milwaukee, which was constructed at St. Louis, $30,438 84, and they allow him on the Winnebago $29,174 20, making an aggregate of $59,613 04, which they suppose is the loss he has sustained in the construction of these two vessels. According to my understanding Mr. Eads constructed some five or six vessels for the Government. Am I to understand that if Mr. Eads made money upon the other contracts he is entitled to be paid for his losses upon these two vessels? I understood from Mr. Eads, who is a very highly honorable gentleman indeed, that upon one or two vessels he had lost some money, but I surely did not understand from him that he lost money upon all the vessels that he constructed. My understanding was quite to the contrary; and if we are to allow large sums of money for losses sustained in the construction of some vessels I cannot see why there should not be a set-off at least of the amount of profits made upon other vessels constructed by the same parties. My friend from Indiana tells me that the Messrs. Secor, who are allowed for large losses by this report, constructed other vessels. Am I, by my vote, to allow them a large amount of money to reimburse them for losses upon the vessels named here without knowing what amount of profit they made upon other vessels? I do not know but that the contracts were all taken together; probably they were all taken together; and it is surely a very dangerous precedent, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, to make these allowances when the parties have really made large sums out of the Government upon other contracts.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that this is a court that we have established to investigate this matter; and he asks, do we not take the reports of the Court of Claims? Certainly we do, but the Court of Claims was established by act of Congress. Was this board established by a joint resolution of Congress? I do not so understand. We are acting upon the supposition that this is an inferior court, and that its decision is binding upon us, and that we must necessarily allow these claims. Why so? This was nothing but a resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 9th of March, 1865, making it the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to organize this board, and directing them to make a report. It was no law of Congress, and this board had none of the attributes of a court. In fact, their proceedings did not possess the solemnity that should attach to a court, and of course we are under no obligations whatever to pay their awards. I understand that this was a mere preliminary proceeding to ascertain the amount of loss sustained by these parties, and if they did sustain any loss, then to open the courts to them, so that there might be an investigation and the amount found due paid.

If the Senators who are urging the passage of this bill will bring in a measure to open the Court of Claims to these parties, not to investigate their legal claims against the Government, because they have none, but to ascertain the amount that is equitably due to them, I am perfectly willing to vote for it. If they have sustained losses on all their contracts taken together with the Government during this period of time, I am perfectly willing to open the doors of a court where they may be heard; but I am wholly unwilling to adopt the proceedings of this board and call it a court binding upon me. Why, sir, I have no evidence before me, nor has any gentleman yet stated that such evidence is before us or can be produced, that this board went outside of the representations of these parties themselves except what was stated by the Senator from Indiana, who always states his positions correctly, that experts, men learned in this business of building ships, were introduced perhaps to testify as to the general cost of these things.

Let us look at this report for one moment. Here is the contract for the Winnipeg:

"The contract for the Winnipeg was made August 21, 1863, to be completed in eleven months; but the vessel was not completed and accepted until March 20, 1865."

Why was that? I see that the parties in this case are allowed every dollar that they claim. The Government is allowed nothing on account of this delay. This board awarded to these parties $63,715 41 for losses, and yet the vessel, which was to have been completed in eleven months after the contract was entered into, which would have been in June, 1864, was not completed until the war had nearly closed. I see no sufficient excuse for that.

Here is the case of the monitor Camanche. What amount do these gentlemen say we must allow them? One hundred and seventy-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-three dollars and eighty cents, the amount of loss, as we are told, sustained by these contractors. What was that contract? It was made June 20, 1862, and the vessel was not completed and delivered until January, 1865—not more than two or three months before the war was concluded. I know that some reasons are stated why the work was delayed, but when we come to look at those reasons they are unsubstantial.

I will now refer to the iron-clad Onondaga. We are told on the sixth page of the report that—"The contract for the iron-clad Onondaga was made May 26, 1862, and was completed February, 1864; the contract price was $625,000, the cost claimed was $710,156 51, and the award $85,203 91."

Now, let us see what the committee say was the cause of this delay:

"The delay in the completion of the vessel was occasioned by 'scarcity of labor, difficulty of obtaining materials, strikes, and having to close his shop for two months on account of mobs in the summer of 1863.'"

Was it in consequence of any action of the Government? Was it in consequence of the depreciation of the currency? There is not a word said about that; but we are told that it was owing to the scarcity of labor, the difficulty of obtaining the materials that entered into the construction of the vessel, and strikes. Why, sir, these things all occur, and they are things, as was very justly said by the Senator from Kentucky, that contractors always take into consideration. Is the Government to be responsible for these things? Surely not. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. If these parties have lost money I really want to allow them something. I do not ask that these parties shall be broken up, or that they shall be ruined when they were doing the best they could, and acting very much as the Government itself was acting, (as was very correctly stated by some Senators,) in the dark, in the construction of these vessels. I am unwilling under all the circumstances that they shall lose if they have lost; but what evidence have we that they have lost?

Mr. COWAN. Was not that the purpose for which this board was created, to ascertain the amount of the loss?

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume so; but surely it has none of the sanctity of a court.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is too good a lawyer to insist upon anything of that sort; and as I understand, this was a mere preparatory proceeding to see whether any legislation should be had on the part of Congress to open the doors of the courts. These parties cannot go now into the Court of Claims and claim damages or ask to be reimbursed for these losses, because they have no legal right to go there. But if they have sustained losses, let us go to work and legislate so that they may be reimbursed; but how? Are we to take as conclusive this proceeding? I do not understand, as the Senator from Pennsylvania will see on the first page of this report, that there was any evidence taken except the statements of the contractors and the bills that they produced.

I do not charge anything corrupt or anything fraudulent upon these contractors, but I do not know that all these bills that are produced by the contractors went into these identical vessels. They were constructing other vessels. I do not suppose that the bills show what vessels the different items were contracted for. The bills do not show into what vessels the items went. As I have shown already in one case, as I understand, Mr. Eads contracted for five or six vessels, and it seems he lost but upon two. I know that Mr. Eads is an honorable gentleman; I am personally acquainted with him; and I know he would not present bills containing items that went into other vessels; but I do not know these other parties; and I will not act even in favor of Mr. Eads, although he is an honored citizen of my own State, until I know that he made nothing upon the other vessels that he constructed for the Government. Such surely is not now my understanding. It may be so. I have had no conference with him on this subject except what I have mentioned, and that occurred a year or two ago.

Now, Mr. President, notwithstanding these contractors may have lost something, I think we ought not to act here in a matter of so much importance, a matter involving over two million dollars, without knowing whether we are disbursing it for the proper parties or not, without knowing that it is justly their due and whether they are entitled to it as men who have done so well as the Senator from Massachusetts claims. I recognize their claims. I recognize the great service they have rendered to the Government. But I apprehend that the most of them undertook this work with a view of making something upon it, that they made the contracts with a view of making money; and, as has been very properly said, these men are shrewd, capable men. They know very well how to make their contracts. If there was any action of the Government which caused them to lose, if by taking, as in the case of the Camanche, the machinery that was provided for that vessel and putting it in another vessel, they were delayed in the construction of the vessel and loss was occasioned in consequence, I am perfectly willing to allow for it; but I will not allow it upon the report of this board. I cannot do it. I do not understand that it was appointed by a joint resolution of Congress. I do not understand we are under any obligation whatever to confirm the awards made in their report. I do not understand that they have taken evidence such as they ought to have taken. I do not understand that both sides of this case have been heard. It is exceedingly difficult to get the truth even when both sides are heard, but you never get the truth when only one side has been heard, and I see nothing to satisfy me that more than one side has been heard in this whole investigation. It is yet to be shown that such is the fact. I have not seen it, and I have yet to learn it. No gentleman has stated it on the floor; and yet this bill is pertinaciously urged upon us. I cannot vote for it, and I hope other Senators will not vote for it until we are better prepared to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the importance of this bill arises not only from the amount of money involved in it, which is $2,250,000—a very large sum of money—but also from the principles upon which it is founded, and especially since the statement made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He admits the correctness of the general rule of law that parties may enforce contracts fairly construed, without any hardship, and if losses occur to the contractor it is his loss; if, on the other hand, profits are made, it is his benefit. That rule is applied to all contracts for the Government by individuals, and no one feels it to be a hardship.

But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts now states that during this war, and by reason of this war, this principle of law cannot be applied and ought not to be applied. If that is true, then there is no end and no limit to the claims upon the Government. If that is true, the same claim that is made in this case may be made in behalf of every person who has furnished oats or hay or corn or supplies of any kind to the Army or Navy. It will apply to every class of claims that is made against the Government. It may be applied to every officeholder of the Government, to every person whose salary has been fixed on a specie standard, to every person whose expenses have been changed by the existence of the war. It would apply to all classes of contracts as well as to mechanics.

Now, I venture to say that there has been no time in the history of America when the mechanics of this country have been so prosperous and have made such large sums of money as they have during the recent war. Great activity has been given to all branches of industry. Every man who has had a shop or who has been engaged in mechanical employments has had constant occupation. All classes of industry have been made prosperous by the demands arising out of the war. The absence of laborers in the field of battle, the absence of ordinary competition, the vast supplies needed by the Government, and the purchase of everything that enters into the consumption of human life were so great during the war that all classes of business men have been prosperous. I venture to say further that the very class of men for whose relief this bill has been provided have been more prosperous during this war than ever before. It is a matter of common remark that they have made large sums of money. Nearly all the wealthy manufacturers have become more wealthy; and this has extended not simply to those articles consumed by the Government, but to all articles of manufacture. There is no class of the people of this country for whom the Senator from Massachusetts could with less force appeal for sympathy than for the mechanical and manufacturing interest of the country, simply because by the extent and nature and character of the war they have had constant occupation and employment without the ordinary competition.

Now, the question arises whether we shall deliberately indorse a principle by which every contractor of the Government may claim from us the losses he has sustained on one particular contract. If the rule was applied generally, and you attempted to ascertain the loss of the individual and reimburse that loss, that would not be so heavy; but that is not the case here. Here a particular class of vessels is selected, and it is shown that the contractors have lost money upon those vessels. Now it may be that these same contractors, as I know is the case, because I know some of these contractors, have made very large sums of money on other contracts with the Government. It is not proposed to deduct those profits; it is not proposed to make an equitable rule upon the quantum meruit principle, and giving them only what is properly and justly and fairly their loss in all their transactions with the Government, but you are to select a particular class of contracts, a particular class of vessels, on which there has probably been a loss of some two millions, and you are to reimburse that loss, leaving them to enjoy all the profits they have made on their contracts with the Government.

I venture to say that every person who owned a machine shop in the city of New York or Philadelphia, or the State of Ohio, who has been employed directly or indirectly in the manufacture of the muniments of war, has made several times the cost of his entire property before the war, if he has managed with ordinary skill, simply because those works have been constantly employed. And yet, because these particular contractors have lost money in the building of a certain class of vessels, you propose to reimburse that loss. It seems to me we ought not to enter upon such a field. I am staggered at the probable results of such a policy. If this bill passes upon the ground on which it is now placed by members of the Senate, we shall have claims without end, and you cannot resist them. There have been cases where persons contracted to deliver hay at fifteen dollars a ton and have paid twenty-five dollars a ton for it. Contracts have been made for oats, for wheat, for transportation, for supplies, for all kinds of muniments of war. Why do you not apply the same principle to those class of cases? You cannot resist them, if you once adopt this rule. I, therefore, am not prepared, on a question involving so large an amount as this particular case, and a principle which involves millions more, to vote for such a proposition.

The Senator from Massachusetts places this claim upon another ground, which I think has been sufficiently answered by the Senator from Missouri, and that is, that we instituted a court; they have made an award, and we are bound to carry into execution that award. If this were a court organized by law, and if an award had been made by it upon principles of law, I should feel bound by that award, although I might not approve of the principles adopted by the court; but that is not the case here. Every day we pass resolutions of inquiry; we call upon the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or the Secretary of the Treasury for information. He furnishes that information. We do not bind ourselves before hand to adopt the conclusions of the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or the Secretary of the Treasury. We do not even bind ourselves to take the facts that he gives us. So in this case, at the end of a long debate, at the end of a controversy upon this very class of claims, a resolution was offered, I think, by the Senator from Iowa—

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no, I did not offer it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some one offered the resolution in the Senate, and my impression is that I voted for it, because I wanted to know the facts.

Mr. GRIMES. It was offered at the executive session, and there was no debate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very fact that the chairman of the Naval Committee cannot tell when this resolution was offered, under what circumstances it was offered, and what inducements led to its being adopted, shows that it had no influence whatever and ought to have no influence whatever in our deliberations.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will see, if he looks at the resolution, when it was offered. It was offered on the 9th of March, 1865.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the executive session?

Mr. CLARK. It must have been, for Congress adjourned on the 4th of March.

Mr. SHERMAN. That shows the folly of basing any argument upon the resolution, except the facts that the committee have brought before us.

Mr. McDougall. The Senator from Ohio will allow me to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether he understands that the resolution was adopted after Congress adjourned. I was present when that resolution was passed.

Mr. CLARK. Here is the record on the report: "In the Senate of the United States, March 9, 1865."

Mr. JOHNSON. That shows when it was adopted.

Mr. CLARK. That is the time, I suppose, when it was offered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March.

Mr. CLARK. It could not have come over, then, from the regular session of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. That shows very clearly that the resolution can have no effect on the debate. It was a mere resolution of inquiry. The Secretary of the Navy could not furnish this information himself, and therefore, at the suggestion of some Senator, we do not know who, it was proposed that the Secretary of the Navy should get this information by means of a board composed of some of his subordinates.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senator that the resolution was offered by the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] I think, upon the last day of the executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution itself was proper, and I have no doubt I should have voted for the resolution, because it tended to procure facts that might influence the judgment of Congress. I cannot say but what if a particular case of hardship was furnished to me, a clear case of loss, and especially if that loss was caused by any act of the Government, I might be willing to reimburse that loss of money caused by the Government. I probably would have voted for the resolution asking for this information, but it has no effect on the judgment of the Senate now. This information is given to us simply like ordinary information from an executive Department. It is not sustained, so far as we know, by any oath. It does not appear from the report, so far as I can see, from the beginning to the end, that any one of these contractors was put on oath.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The testimony was all under oath.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not stated on the face of the report. At any rate, it is ex parte in its very nature. Now, it seems that the amount of the claims, according to one allegation of this report, was $2,383,520 20, and the amount of the awards is $2,267,627; so that it appears that they have scarcely made any variation between the amount of the claim and the amount of the award. This is always a remarkable fact, because we know that human interests prompt us strongly—

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will pardon me, the board were not to report what they thought due, but what was the cost of these vessels, and they, of course, would take that from the contractors.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that the losses claimed before the board by the parties in interest were $2,383,000, while they actually awarded the sum of $2,267,000. That very fact shows that they did not scrutinize these claims very closely, because it is not in the nature of things, be men ever so honest, but that there would be a greater difference between the aggregate of claims among a great number of contractors and the aggregate of awards than is made in this case. It is only a difference of three or four per cent. I do not deny that there may be many meritorious cases in this report; but I can only say that the principles upon which this report is founded are not such as will induce me to vote from the Treasury of the United States two and a quarter million dollars, and establish a principle which, in my judgment, will lead to a very large expenditure.

Senators must remember that we shall be called upon before this session closes to pass upon a character of claims that will test the judgment of every Senator. A demand will be made upon us by those who are most deserving of our bounty and our favor, who have protected and maintained the Government during four years of terrible war; a demand will be made by the soldiers for $200,000,000 for the equalization of bounties. A demand is made by the loyal States, and a bill on the subject is now being pressed in the House of Representatives, for $150,000,000. Demands of every character and kind are constantly pressed upon Congress. Indeed, if we do not resist with a firm and unyielding hand here in the Senate, where the body is of a more permanent and durable character, these claims upon the public Treasury—the expenses of this year may run up to a period of one year of the war—we may destroy the interest of all the widows and orphans and the people of this country who have invested their property in the public debt; we may impair the public debt; we may adopt principles which will lead to expenditure without limit and without restraint. I, for one, am disposed to scrutinize carefully every claim that is now made upon the Government, and to yield only when that claim is proven to be just and proper, but not sooner than that.

Among the persons who would be benefited by this bill is a gentleman whom I regard as highly as any man in the State of Ohio; a man of great energy, skill, and capacity, and yet I could not be influenced by a desire to give him even what he might claim to be just, to vote this large sum of money and adopt a principle which might be injurious to the people at large, at least without further testimony than we have presented to us in this report. If, however, the matter is pressed to a vote, I intend before the subject is closed to offer an amendment, which I will now read, and which, adopting the principles upon which this bill is founded, I do not see how any member of the Senate can vote against it. It is to add to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa the following:

Provided further, That no payment shall be made to any person, firm, or corporation who have received profits on other contracts with the United States, greater than such award; and for the purpose of ascertaining the same the said board is hereby reorganized, and shall inquire and determine the profits of each person, firm, or corporation derived from such other contracts, and such profits shall be deducted from such award.

If the principle on which we are asked to act in this case is to be adopted, then, as a matter of course, this same board ought to extend their observations beyond these particular contracts and ought to look and see whether the individual, firm, or corporation whose poverty or distress we are about to relieve is not already rich in accumulated profit on other contracts. It may be that this board will find that although in these particular cases of contracts losses have been suffered, yet these very contractors who are appealing to our sympathy, and who have so excited the sympathy of our friend from Massachusetts, are now wealthy far beyond their highest ambition before the war occurred. If the principle is to be adopted of making good all the losses, we ought at least to be credited with the profits growing out of this war.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is pleasant for me to be once in accord with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I think with him that Governments should be protectors and not oppressors. There seems to be a great lack of information here on matters of and about which every Senator on this floor should be well informed. These claims were presented to the Senate at an early day of the last Congress; they went to the Naval Committee, but the accounts stated were not satisfactory to the Navy Department, and the Senate itself passed a resolution directing an inquiry to ascertain the actual cost of these vessels and their machinery. The vessels were at that time esteemed highly—more so than they seem to be by some now. A board was organized of men of the most accomplished skill in such matters, nominated by the official representative of the Executive of this Government. It was not necessary that the men should be of great accomplishments in many respects, because they were only to inquire what was the true cost of these vessels and their machinery. For six months that board sat in continuous session at the Brooklyn navy-yard and in the city of New York. The board represented the Government of the United States, having been selected by the Secretary of the Navy. Testimony was taken pro and con, every man under oath, as in a court of justice. It was carefully done by men who understand the law of carefulness, as men who are educated to the business of officers of our Navy and engineers and constructors in the naval service do understand it; done carefully as it could be done by men who understand what is the underlying basis of all truth, mathematics. After careful investigation, at the invitation of the Senate, under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, we have had their results on our tables for a long time. The detailed testimony was submitted to the Naval Committee, and as the conclusion of the deliberations of that committee this bill is submitted to us; no member of the committee dissenting except one, and he is a dissenter; but he does not controvert a single thing affirmed in the report of the board that sat at Brooklyn, presided over by Commodore Selfridge, or a single thing that is affirmed by the committee who investigated the subject.

Now, it is well that there should be some objectors. That is the vocation of the Senator from Iowa, and I may say the same of the Senator from Ohio. But it is well to affirm the right. Governments have no right to do wrong any more than individuals. When these contracts were made the price of labor was altogether different than during the period when the contracts were performed, and why? Because of the exceptional condition of our country, well stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, and there are exceptions that prove rules. I remember well that there came forward men of large fortunes, men of great enterprise, men of high patriotism, willing to lend their fortunes and hopes to the Government. They were perhaps too old for arms; I saw many of them; they said, "We will furnish you arms, we will build you ships, build you anything; all we want is an order." The men who came forward to build the iron-clads were of that class, the best men of the country, and men not only of great mechanical skill, but who had won wealth by their enterprise and their skill, and were ornaments to the country. They came forward willing to hazard their fortunes. No one could anticipate, as the Senator from Massachusetts well remarked, it was not within the precognition of any human being, what would be the condition of the country twelve months from the time. What happened? Money, not the representative of money, rose to two for one. Prices appreciated accordingly two for one.

Again, the exigency of the Government required all the labor to be employed and three times as many rolling mills as could be obtained in Pennsylvania and otherwise to get out the material for clothing the iron-clads; consequently up went iron.

All these things were not within the possibility of contemplation by the most prescient men. It was special to this class of enterprise. I think that the first Secretary of War under the last Administration gave contracts to some people to build wagons who made great fortunes, and contracts for saddles, out of which great fortunes were made, and so of contracts for harness, and cattle, horses, and many other things. But the business of building these iron-clads was a business of dollars and cents; it could be shown by the books, proved by exact testimony, established as a fact in a court of justice, how much they cost. It was well known by these gentlemen that they would be ruined unless the Government would protect them. They came forward and built their ships; they put them on the sea; they destroyed their enemies. They knew then that they were expending I think at least thirty per cent. over and above what the contract price was, and that their whole fortune was gone unless they should be protected. They came here; they asked relief from the Senate. The Senate sent them to the Secretary of the Navy, asking that it should be carefully inquired into, not what was a fair profit on this labor, but what was the cost of material and labor, and that award is sent to us, and I say we shall be dishonest if we do not pay it. I do not believe it belongs to Government to be dishonest.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall detain the Senate but a few moments in answer to a point or two made by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio. I do not think that their view of the subject is just to the parties that present this claim. In the first place, the Senator from Missouri says that before the board that was organized there was no evidence, so far as he can observe, except the testimony of the parties themselves. Now, Mr. President, I think that if the board was satisfied with that evidence and reported it as satisfactory, we should be slow to question even that testimony, for during the last Congress we made parties to actions competent witnesses in ordinary suits in the courts between man and man; and if this board received the testimony of the parties themselves, together with their books of account, their detailed statements of expenditure, and relied upon that, I should not disregard the results of their investigation because of that alone. But the Senator has not thoroughly examined the report of the board, as he stated himself, else he would have found very material testimony in addition to that of the parties themselves; and I will call his attention to the testimony of Naval Constructor Pook, on pages 30 and 31 of the report of the board. I will read just one or two sentences of that testimony to show the character of it. In answer to a question, he says:

"Having examined the bills of cost and extra work of gunboat Chenango, built by Jeremiah Simonson, I find them to be fair and reasonable in every respect. Having examined the bills of cost and extra work for the gunboats Massasoit and Osage, built by Curtis & Tilden, I find them correct, charges fair and reasonable, and consider that the bill for extra work should be paid in full. Having examined the bills of cost and extra work for the gunboat Pontiac, built by Hillman & Strecker, I find them correct, charges fair and reasonable, and consider that the bill for extra work should be paid in full. Having examined the bill of cost of gunboat Wyandott, built by C. H. and W. M. Cramp, I find it to be correct, fair and reasonable in every respect. Having examined the bills of cost and extra work for the gunboats Agawam and Pontoosac, built by George W. Lawrence, I find them correct, fair, and reasonable, and consider that the bill for extra work should be paid in full."

And he goes on with other accounts. Then he comes to another account where he says he finds these items not to be fair and correct, and that they ought not to be allowed as they are presented; and upon his testimony the naval board acts. Then I find that Naval Constructor Delano, an experienced man in the construction of vessels-of-war, was also a witness before the board; also, Assistant Engineer Pierce and Chief Engineers Lawton and Brooks were witnesses before the board. I have been able to refer to these during the discussion. What other testimony there was before the board in addition to the testimony of the parties, I am not able at the moment to say; but this testimony of these officers of the Government is upon the very points that the board was investigating.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him. The point to which I wish to direct his attention is this: did these parties who were witnesses before the board, and to whom he now refers, have any personal knowledge of the work, or were they connected with it as superintendents in any such manner that they would necessarily know that these were the items of articles that went into the construction of these identical vessels?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course these naval constructors being skilled men knew what ought to go into a ship. Suppose that the cost of a house is in investigation before a court; suppose we are investigating the cost of a house, and the size of it is given, the material that goes into it is known to a carpenter or a mechanic just as well as if he saw each piece put into the house.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did they superintend the work or had they any personal knowledge of it, or were they men connected with the Government here, naval constructors in this city, or were they naval constructors at New York or elsewhere?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not able to say where these men lived, or where they discharged the duties of their office. I find them to be officers of the Government employed in the construction of vessels. Whether they were superintendents of these particular vessels I cannot answer the Senator, nor do I care. They knew the character of the vessels, their dimensions, and all about them; and when called upon to examine the accounts presented they say that those accounts are correct. It must be so, because they know what would necessarily go into a vessel of the sort.

Another point made by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio is that we are not required to give much force to the finding of the board; for what reason? For the reason that that board was organized pursuant to a resolution of the Senate. I am not able to understand the moral force of that argument. If the House of Representatives had concurred in the resolution, and a board, composed perhaps of these same men, had been organized by the Secretary of the Navy under a joint resolution, do the Senators believe that the investigations of the board would have been more thorough than they were when it was organized by a resolution of the Senate? Where is the force of that objection? These officers were discharging a duty to the Government. Did they not do it fully and fairly? If the award of arbitrators is questioned because of partiality, mistake, or fraud, you must show it; the fact must be made known; and in the absence of some evidence on the subject the award is presumed to be honestly made, and made upon a full investigation of the case. Now, here is a board organized pursuant to a resolution of the Senate. I was not present, as I now recollect, when that resolution was passed, for I think I left a day or two before the adjournment of the extra session, and I knew nothing about its introduction or its passage; but it is a resolution of the Senate, and a board is organized pursuant to it to do a particular duty for the Government. Why is it that the finding of that board has less moral weight with the Senate than it would have if the board had been organized under a joint resolution of the two Houses? I am not able to see.

The Senator from Missouri referred to the case of the Onondaga. That vessel is said to be one of a very fine and very superior order. The Senator said that the delay in the construction of that vessel was not occasioned by any act of the Government. If he will turn to page 19 of the record of the board, he will find that he is mistaken. It appears there:

"That the causes of delay in building the hull and machinery of the Onondaga were on account of expensive alterations, and also the same as apply to the Chenango and Ascutney."

Expensive alterations were ordered by the Government. Both Senators referred to the fact that some of these parties may have constructed other vessels and may have made profits out of those vessels, and it is proposed by them to set off the profits that may have been made in the construction of other vessels against the losses that were sustained on these. Upon what principle does that rest? It is a new idea to me. I know nothing about this except that I heard it stated, from no reliable authority, that Messrs. Eads & Co., constituents of the Senator from Missouri, had made money in other work. I know nothing about it except just as I have heard a rumor to that effect. Suppose that Eads & Co. did make money in building some other ship, was it not right that they should make something? Ought the profits that were made by them in the pursuit of their business, profits that they would have made in doing work for individual citizens of the country, be taken away from them because they sustained a loss on other vessels? I do not understand this proposition of setting off profits that may have been made on other vessels as against losses sustained on these. I do not understand it either as a legal or a moral proposition, unless they obtained the contracts on which they made the profits by improper influences, unless there was fraud in them. Then perhaps there would be some moral propriety in off-setting. I do not know that the contracts were made all together; but I think they were different contracts for different characters of vessels. I know nothing about it; but if they made profits, it is what mechanics expect, that they shall make some profit, and I cannot see the principle of taking away their profits on one vessel because they sustained a loss on another.

Mr. President, suppose that Eads & Co. in 1862 made a contract to build two vessels, and the Government suggested from time to time alterations in those vessels, and they are the losers upon those vessels to the amount of $50,000, and suppose they take contracts for two other vessels, and the Government does not interfere at all, there is no trouble about them, and they go on and complete their contracts within the time specified and they make a profit on those contracts, why shall you take that away which is right and which they ought to enjoy to set it off against losses which were occasioned in part by the act of the Government?

The Senator from Ohio used an illustration that I think is unfortunate for the purposes of his argument. He says that men have lost money by buying corn, oats, horses, and other things for the Government during the war; and that we upon the same principle that we indemnify the constructors of iron-clads and monitors ought to indemnify those ordinary contractors. I am surprised that the Senator does not see a difference. A man goes to a quartermaster or a commissary for what purpose? Not to produce but for the purpose of buying and then selling to the Government upon speculation. His purpose is exclusively to make a speculation. The mechanic in his shop produces; he is not a speculator; he is a laborer. He expects by his labor and his enterprise and his skill and his judgment to make a profit, and he makes a contract with the Government and the Government interferes with him in the prosecution of that contract and he asks to be reimbursed; and it is said to him by the Senator from Ohio, "You, a mechanic that expend your money and your labor for the benefit of the Government, stand upon the same moral proposition as the speculator, the shoddy contractor, who expected profit and nothing else when he made his contract." A man contracts with the Government to furnish corn or hay or oats for the Army; he expects to go out and make his purchases at once to fill his contract; he knows what the prices are, and he can go out and satisfy his contract at once. If he contracts to supply a thousand head of horses at $100 a head, he knows what the present cost of horses in the market is and he goes out at once and fills his bid.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Suppose the horses are to be delivered three or four months hence, and the price rises in the mean time?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then he takes it as a speculation; but I say that the mechanic who undertakes to do work for the Government which cannot be completed within six months, and which is not, because of the act of the Government, completed within eighteen months, does not stand before the country and before Congress as a speculator. Here are men in New York that have shops; they are doing work for the country; they are building machinery for the demands of the business of the country, making money, and the Government says to them, "We want a ship built." They devote their entire energy, their capital, and their machinery to the production of this ship. It is not a matter of speculation; it is an enterprise for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to inquire whether this is a bill for the benefit of mechanics or contractors? How much of this money will go to the workmen that he is talking about?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know of a single case in which this does not go for the benefit of a mechanic. There may be some of these contractors who are not mechanics, but I am not aware of a single case of that kind.

The workman, the particular mechanic who assisted the contractor in his shop, has received his wages from month to month. As the wages went up he was paid. When the contract was made the laborer got eleven cents an hour. In two months from that time he got thirteen cents; two months further on he got fifteen cents; and two months further on he got eighteen cents. He has been paid this; he could compel the contractor to pay it. The contractor himself is the mechanic, investing his labor, his skill, his judgment, and his means in his shop; and he produces a vessel that is acceptable to the Department and that is valuable to the Government. I say he is not to be compared to the man who goes out into the market to buy up what may be needed for the Army for the purposes of speculation.

The Senator from Ohio says that mechanics have made more money during the war than they ever made before. If the Government had not expected of these mechanics to construct ships, and they had been left to pursue their ordinary business, they, too, would have enjoyed the advantages, so far as advantages were enjoyed, coming from the war; but having to construct these ships, they are losers. Does the Senator question the fact; does the Senator doubt the fact that they are losers? Then why does he say that mechanics have made money? We are talking about these particular cases. They have not made money. Other mechanics have made money, I admit. The Senator, I presume, is aware of the fact that for three years back the railroad companies have not been able to make contracts for the delivery of locomotives at any period in the future; and why? Because mechanics have known for three years past that there was a constant advance in the cost of material and labor, and they would not make contracts for future delivery, but required the companies to pay what an engine was worth when produced. But here the Government obtained from these parties their contracts; and the question is, under all the circumstances, shall they be held to the bond?

The Senator says the award is large; it is $2,267,000. That is what the board say were the losses. I think myself that the losses ought to be paid because they have been occasioned in part by the act of the Government. The Senator from Nevada proposes by his amendment that it shall be restricted in the highest case to fifteen per cent. upon the contract price. I believe that would reduce it very nearly a million dollars. The Senator from Ohio proposes that it shall be twelve per cent. I think, then, the reduction would be something more than a million dollars. The precise amount I cannot state to the Senate.

Mr. McDougall. Permit me to ask the Senator a question. I have not listened to the entire debate. Is there an exceptional case in regard to the Camanche?

Mr. Hendricks. Yes, the Camanche is excepted by the amendment. The entire award was $2,267,627 18. A restriction to twenty per cent. upon the cost price would be $1,721,524 68. Reducing it to fifteen per cent. I suppose would allow $1,300,000 or $1,400,000; and reducing it to twelve per cent. I suppose would leave it about $1,000,000, so that the Senator from Iowa proposes that these contractors shall lose above $1,000,000 by his amendment. Now, I submit to the Senate that as the entire loss is proven before a board organized by the Government itself, at least by a Department of the Government, to be above $2,000,000, is it not enough that you ask it to be reduced $1,000,000, that you should make fall on these contractors a loss of $1,000,000?

The Senator from Ohio says that this was an ex parte examination. If it were proposed between two men to arbitrate a matter of dispute between them, and it was agreed that one of the litigating parties should select all the arbitrators, perhaps it would be said that was ex parte. He selects the court himself, and certainly he cannot complain of the award when made. Under a resolution of the Senate the Government itself selected the board. These contractors, whose interest depended on the judgment of the board, had no voice in the selection of the men that were to try their case. The Secretary of the Navy, representing the Government, organized the board. That board, having no interest, no sympathy with the contractors, but of the Government's own selection, heard the testimony for five months, and made its award.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of curiosity I would like to ask my friend from Indiana if the Supreme Court of the United States is an ex parte tribunal. I need hardly ask him for an answer.

Mr. Hendricks. No, sir, I never esteemed it so.

Mr. SHERMAN. And yet the Supreme Court of the United States is selected by the President of the United States, and decides causes in which the United States are interested. Therefore his argument that this is an ex parte board, because appointed by an officer of the United States, is hardly of much force.

Mr. Hendricks. The suggestion of the Senator is forcible, but it was not myself that was saying this was an ex parte proceeding. I have not complained of it as an ex parte one. I am answering the argument of the Senator from Ohio; he said it was an ex parte proceeding, and the award was ex parte. If it was ex parte at all, I was going to show it was ex parte on the side of the Government, not on the side of the contractors.

Mr. SHERMAN. The evidence was ex parte, that is what I said.

Mr. Hendricks. So far as the evidence is concerned, it is from the mouth of the parties themselves and from the mouth of Government officials. Neither in the organization of the board nor in the evidence that was heard by the board was it an ex parte proceeding. If the Senate are willing that these men shall be destroyed in an enterprise that was so important to the Government at the time, in an enterprise in which they were materially interfered with by the Government itself, then I submit to the judgment of the Senate, it is not my judgment. I do not think our country requires it. I do not think the constituency I represent ask it at my hands. I do not think that between man and man they would themselves render such a judgment. When the Government itself has interfered so that the contracts were not completed at the time contemplated, so that these parties had to pay instead of sixty dollars, $145 per ton for iron, I do not think that the constituency that I represent will desire me to say that all of this loss shall fall upon the enterprising men who gave up their shops from profitable employment to an employment that yielded no profit. We ask no profit for it; we ask simply that they shall not be destroyed; and the proposition of the Senator from Iowa is (and with the slight amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada I will agree to it, and if that should not meet with the concurrence of the Senate I would then agree to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa) that of the $2,267,000 of loss more than $1,000,000 shall still fall upon the contractors.

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. President, the hour admonishes me that I have but a short time to speak, and I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes. I shall vote against this bill in its present form. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nevada in the first place, but I would prefer the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. With either of these amendments attached to the bill, I am willing to vote for it.

There is one fact that has escaped the attention of Senators upon this floor, and it is a question of contract. If I had not already been convinced, the Senator from Ohio would have convinced me by his argument that if you open the door in this matter, other contractors can come in and claim additional compensation. I am for additional compensation in these cases, but not in the way it is asked for in the bill.

In my city the largest firm there built two of the largest monitors and have not asked for additional compensation. They have not come forward to knock at the doors of Congress and ask for additional compensation. Another firm in my city comes forward and asks for it. Now, how do they predicate their contracts? My friend, the Senator from Indiana, alluded to a contract for a house a few minutes ago. How does such a contractor predicate his bid? He goes around and asks the stone-mason how much he will put up the stonework for; he asks the brick-layer how much he will put up the brickwork for; he asks the plasterer how much he will put up the plastering for by the yard; so with the shingling, the roofing, and all; and before he takes the contract he predicates his bid on the sub-contracts he can make. How do these machinists do? How have they done? I know how they have done; the Senator from Ohio knows how they have done. Before they make a contract with the Government they make arrangements for the iron and steel conditioned on the receipt of a contract from the Government; they get the material at the price it was worth when the Government asked their proposals.

Now, if you give fifteen per cent., or twelve per cent., as the Senator from Iowa suggests, that pays amply for the increased cost of labor; the mechanics do not suffer; they will lose nothing by this operation. But in the event of passing the bill as reported the contractor makes the money and the mechanic gets nothing out of it. This is a fact which can be substantiated by every practical man living in a city where these iron-clad vessels have been built; although an institution in my city is interested in it, I care nothing for that. I say that unless the Senate adopt the amendments offered, I shall oppose the bill and take another opportunity to consider the subject.

Mr. CLARK. I have found a good deal of difficulty in regard to this class of cases, and the difficulty arises from their being classed together. I have no doubt, from the examination I have made, that there are meritorious cases included in the bill, and perhaps there are some cases which ought to have as high an award as this board has reported. I am satisfied from the examination I have given that there are others who ought not to have anything at all; so that if I vote for the bill either in the amended form or in the form in which it comes from the committee I am likely to do injustice to somebody.

I have been, Mr. President, casting around to see what we could do with a proposition of this kind. It first occurred to me that you might refer it to the Court of Claims, but yet I am satisfied that the Court of Claims would not do justice to some of the cases that are here, because a man may not have a legal claim who may have an equitable claim, and he would not be able to recover there; and yet I am satisfied that this board, which was constituted at the last session of Congress, was not a board to report upon what was due to these contractors; it only considered one side, that is, what the vessels had cost these men; it did not consider the other side, what deductions ought to be made by the Government in paying them the amount; so that it cannot be called any fair arbitration, or award, as the Senator from Indiana termed it, because they considered only one side, that is, the cost. If the question had been submitted to the board what deductions shall be made from the cost when you find it, that would have been an entirely different thing; but they were instructed only to consider what was the cost of the vessel in each case, and report to Congress. And yet the Senator from Nevada says that having committed it to them to award the cost, we are bound to pay it. I do not understand it so.

Mr. NYE. I did not say exactly that.

Mr. CLARK. That was the substance of what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. NYE. I said that, admitting the principle that anything is to be paid, we should pay the ascertained cost.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot quite agree to that, that if anything is to be paid we ought to pay the award, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. NYE. The cost is to be paid.

Mr. CLARK. If the cost is to be paid, we are to pay what is reported; but we have not come to an agreement to pay what the cost is reported to be, because it lays out of the case entirely the equities on the other side. Now, if you will constitute a board, and a fair board—I do not care who you take, whether they are builders, mechanics, or merchants, if they are fair people, and refer the matter to them with authority to say what ought to be paid under all the circumstances by the Government, then I might perhaps be willing to abide by that award; but I am certainly not willing to abide by an award which has been made showing only the cost, when so far as I can ascertain—and the Senator from Indiana will correct me if I am wrong—the committee did not receive any new testimony on that point. He will allow me to inquire whether there was any testimony before the committee going to show what deductions should be made other than what came from the report of the board.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the Senator I will say that at the last session of Congress the committee had before them two of the heads of bureaus in the Navy Department, the head of the Engineering Bureau and of the Construction Bureau, Mr. Lenthall and Mr. Isherwood, and also Superintendent Wood. They testified before the committee at the last session. What they testified at that time was incorporated into the report made by the committee at the last session, and it is extracted into the report made at this session. The committee had also before them a document certified to by Admiral Gregory who had charge of this work, showing the cost of labor and materials from time to time—the table which is appended to the report. I do not know whether that was before the board or not. I do not know of any other testimony that was before the committee that was not before the board.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that at the last session, before the committee as then constituted, some testimony was given. I do not know whether the committee is the same now or not; probably it is nearly the same; but at this session, after this report from the board comes to them, they consider it and consider in addition what was said at the last session, and the evidence furnished them then. Now, I want to say one word in regard to the table, for I am satisfied that the table is not made up correctly in some instances. Take, for instance, the cost of pig iron in 1864. It is said to be in the month of January, forty-five dollars; in the month of February, fifty dollars; and so running through. I happen to have in my possession an affidavit, furnished by a house in New York, of actual sales, and they quote the sales from their books made through the months of 1864, all the months, and I have compared it with this table, and the actual sales which they made were from ten to fifteen per cent. lower than the prices quoted in the table. But I have not had the opportunity of examining the table further, because I had no means.

Mr. WILLEY. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether the iron, the sales of which he refers to; was the same kind of iron and of the superior quality required for these vessels.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot say what quality it was. It is quoted as pig-iron, as the general quotation is here "American pig-iron." It does not appear from this table what the quality was.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was a very superior quality.

Mr. CLARK. It may have been very superior, but I do not understand it to be so.

Mr. GRIMES. That would depend somewhat upon what it was used for in either case.

Mr. CLARK. For common ordinary castings it would not require a very superior quality.

Mr. GRIMES. If it was to go into the engines it would require extra iron. If the pig-iron was to go into the dome of the Capitol it would not necessarily be very superior.

Mr. CLARK. But I was not proposing to comment on that, because I am willing to take the tables as I find them for the purpose of what I have to say. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the first case reported here, to show what may be the equities on the one side and the other. If he will take the report and follow me a little while, I will call his attention to the case of the Iosco. It will be found that the contractors for building the hull of the Iosco were Larrabee & Allen, and they went on to construct the vessel, and they brought in their bill of costs, and their costs exceed the contract price and the extra work by $11,708 97. It is the first case upon the list. If the Senator will be kind enough to turn to page 10 of the report of the board he will find this case of the Iosco specially reported:

"Regarding the United States steamer Iosco, side-wheel, double-enders: on the part of the contractors and builders of the above vessel appeared before the board A. L. Allen, ship-builder, Bath, Maine, who under oath stated that the contract for the above vessel was signed by the Navy Department on the 9th day of September, 1862, in which he was allowed one hundred and twenty-six days to launch the vessel, or until January 13, 1863, but the vessel was not put into the water until March 20, 1863, the vessel being detained on the stocks by order of Admiral Gregory and Inspector Pook—"

Now, this is the reason—

"as the engine builders were not ready to set up the engine; that the vessel was delivered to the Globe Works, South Boston, March 21, 1863; that thirty days, or until May 13, were allowed to erect the machinery on board, but the work was not completed until March 5, 1864, three hundred and forty-six days."

The engine builders were to have erected that work in the vessel in thirty days, and they took three hundred and forty-six days to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is any reason given for the delay?

Mr. CLARK. There is no reason given for the delay here; I am going to go on a little further. Mr. Allen says further:

"That his vessel could not have been ready for launching at the expiration of the contract, and they were in no fault for this delay or loss of time to Government; that the contract price for the vessel delivered at Boston amounted to $75,500; that the entire cost of the vessel was $91,845 91; that in addition to the contract price he has been paid by bureau for extra work $4,535 84; that the cost to him of the vessel over and above the contract and extra bills paid was $11,810 07; and would state that, in addition to the great extra expense to which he was placed by the delay of the engine builders to complete their work, he was obliged to keep watchmen and to furnish material and outfits at greatly increased prices and larger wages for labor."

You see he was put to great extra expense by the delay of the engine builders.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask whether the engine builder is allowed anything in this bill?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir. The engine builder is allowed, as I will show presently, something like thirty thousand dollars for the delay. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the contract for the hull and the contract of the engine builder to show the injustice that is to be done here. The contractor who built the hull clearly ought to be paid; he was delayed by somebody; Admiral Gregory and Constructor Pook kept the vessel on the stocks until it was necessary for her to be sent to the Globe Works to have her machinery put in, and then when she got there thirty days were to have been consumed in putting in that machinery so that he could have finished his vessel, and yet these engine builders took in the whole three hundred and forty-six days to put in that engine, and he was put to this delay. The board have rightfully awarded him, probably, eleven thousand and odd dollars for that delay, but the question is who should pay it. Do you propose that the Government should pay it when the engine builders caused that delay, not the Government; the Government were in no fault.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the engine builder contracted with the Government, not with these parties.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, with the Government, so that the Government would have to stand between the contractor for the hull and the contractor for the engines, but in equity it should come out of the engine builder.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the end it should according to these facts; but you would not throw the builder of the hull on the engine builder.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I would not; but if I had to pay $11,000 to the builder of the hull for the delay of this engine builder, I would not give this engine builder $30,000 extra over his contract for doing it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not.

Mr. CLARK. Now let us turn to page 15 of this report:

"Appeared before the board Daniel N. Pickering, treasurer of the Globe Works, South Boston, Massachusetts, on the part of the company, contractors for the machinery of the double-enders Iosco and Massachusetts. Under oath stated, that the contracts for these vessels were dated by the Navy Department August 15, 1862, in which they were allowed seven months, or until March 14, 1863—"

When the vessel was ready—

"to complete the machinery and deliver the vessels to the Government, but the Massachusetts was not so completed and delivered until the 9th of January, 1864, nor the Iosco until the 18th of January, 1864, the principal cause of delay being the difficulty in obtaining workmen, as the demand for the services of men in the Army and Navy was so great, and also on account of the number of vessels being built by the Government."

Because the Government was choosing to build vessels in other yards these people were delayed, and therefore you are to pay them for their delay. And now you allow for this engine of the Iosco the sum of $29,789 because they did not finish it until nearly a year after they agreed to do it. You compel the Government to pay $11,000 on the hull because they were not ready, and then give them $29,000 for that delay. That is the justice of this operation, and that is the "justice" to these contractors which the Senator from Indiana talks about.

I have got as strong a case as that in another instance. I have had time to examine only two or three of these cases, because one cannot go through forty-two cases in one day.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that the only excuse in that case?

Mr. CLARK. That is the only excuse. I will read the whole of what was said.

Mr. JOHNSON. You need not on my account.

Mr. CLARK. They say that the demand for men for the Army and Navy, and the number of vessels being built by the Government, made it "impossible, with the scarcity of labor, to fulfill the contracts within the given time." There is the whole of it. Now, if the Senate will turn to the case of the Chenango, on page 4, they will find:

"Appeared before the board Jeremiah Simonson, ship-builder, and constructor of United States steamer Chenango, under oath stated the whole amount of cost of above vessel to have been $91,441 81; the amount of extra work allowed and paid by bureau, $3,528 17; the amount of contract, $75,000; and presented the accompanying sworn statement, marked 3, showing the cost of that vessel over and above the contract price and allowance paid for extra work to be $16,441 81."

And here in the table you find $16,441 81 for the steamer Chenango. Now, what was the occasion for that? Mr. Simonson's statement proceeds:

"That the contract for the hull was dated September 9, 1862, and the vessel to be launched on January 13, 1863, (one hundred and twenty-six days); that the hull was ready for launching at that time, but was detained on the ways by request of the naval constructor and inspector of hulls, S. M. Pook, to be hereafter shown, as the steam machinery was not ready."

The same excuse again; the steam machinery was not ready; this man was delayed because the steam machinery was not ready.

"That the hull was launched on March 19, 1863, and that no injury arose to the Government from delay on his part; that the contractors for the steam machinery were allowed until May 8 (fifty days) to erect on board the engines, &c., but occupied until December 30, 1863, (two hundred and eighty-four days.)"

It took two hundred and eighty-four days to get that machinery in.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where was the machinery to be built?

Mr. CLARK. I will show the Senator presently; I do not now remember; but I will call his attention to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought you had it before you.

Mr. CLARK. It is in another part of the volume, page 18. This was built at the Morgan Iron Works, New York. Now, I want Senators to bear in mind that there was no delay here on the part of the contractor for the hull. He was obliged to keep his vessel unfinished because the steam machinery was not erected in her, and was put to delay on that account, and they took two hundred and eighty-four days to erect that machinery, and he claims of the Government, and has been allowed by the board, the sum of $16,441 81 on account of the delay of these people in erecting that machinery in his boat. That is the sole cause of it. Now, let us turn over to page 18 of the report and see what the Morgan Iron Works, who were to build this machinery, did; here is the statement of Mr. Quintard, who is the man that got up the table appended to the committee's report:

"Appeared before the board, George W. Quintard, proprietor of the Morgan Iron Works, New York, and contractor for the machinery of the double-enders Chenango and Ascutney; also for the hull and machinery of the iron-clad Onondaga. Under oath states, that the contracts for the Chenango and Ascutney were dated by the Navy Department August 15, 1862, in which he was allowed seven months, or until March 16, 1863, to complete the machinery of said vessels and deliver them to the Government, but the Chenango was not so completed and delivered until February 1, 1864."

The Chenango was not completed until February 1, 1864, ten months after he agreed to do it, and he had been keeping this hull all the time unfinished and putting the man who built it to expense because he failed in his contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. What reasons did he assign?

Mr. CLARK. I will go on and read the reasons he assigned:

"The principal causes of the delay in completing the machinery of these vessels were scarcity of labor, difficulty of obtaining materials, strikes, and having to close his shop for two months on account of mobs in the summer of 1863."

Nothing in the world in which the Government was concerned, things likely to happen, perhaps, to any contractor; and yet he delayed that hull ten months, putting the Government to the cost of $16,000, and now he wants the Government to pay him for all that delay just what the machinery cost.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much is allowed him?

Mr. CLARK. For the Chenango there was allowed him extra for putting in that machinery, ten months after it should have been, $25,826 35. It is said that the Chenango blew up on her trial trip, but I am not talking to that point. I am taking this work as if it had been done well. I am speaking of the delay which he caused and his equity to have pay from the Government. Mr. Quintard says, further:

"That he was relieved by an act of Congress from the terms of his contract, so far as the time of completion was concerned, and that the Department was fully satisfied that it was finished as soon as possible; that the excess of cost over and above the contract price was on account of the continued rise in the price of labor and material; that the total cost of the machinery for both vessels, including charge of ten per cent. for use of shop, tools, &c., was $215,652 67; that the contract price of both vessels paid by the Government was $164,000, leaving a balance, the excess of cost to him, over and above the contract price, of $51,652 67."

That is $25,826 34 for each vessel; and this man who has delayed you ten months and put you to the expense of $16,000 on one vessel has the impudence to charge you ten per cent. on his whole stock and tools, and your commission allow it.

Mr. JOHNSON. For the ten months?

Mr. CLARK. It simply says ten per cent., without reference to time; and now there is an appeal to the equity and justice of Congress to pay that demand!

These are the only two cases in this whole report which I have examined, and I have no doubt that if I were to follow it through I should find others of a similar character. I took the first and then took another at haphazard to see how they would come, and I find that result.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see exactly how he could charge for the use of his shop and tools. That was included, I suppose, in the contract price.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose he kept some account of the labor and material he had put into this vessel, and then charged ten per cent. on the tools and shop as a part of the cost of the vessel.

Mr. JOHNSON. During the ten months he delayed it?

Mr. CLARK. I suppose ten per cent. for one year. I do not wish to be severe on these contractors. I only make these observations for the purpose of showing what injustice you are likely to do here to the Government and the people who pay the money; for while these contractors are to be protected, the taxpayer also is to be regarded. While you undertake to do justice to those who deserve it, you certainly cannot do it in this inconsiderate way, which encourages those who have no just claim to come here with the expectation that Congress will pay any amount which they make out.

Now, I ask the Senate to pause; I do not know what is best to be done. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Iowa reaches the case entirely, if you cut it down to twelve per cent. I doubt if some of these parties ought to have anything, and perhaps some ought to have fifty per cent. It is the indiscriminate lumping of forty-two cases in one bill that works the mischief. Give us one by one if it takes time, and let us consider each or establish a board that will consider the cases one by one, and give each man his due, not bring all up here in this omnibus which is to carry everything to the end of the journey and make you pay the fare.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill. I have heard all that has been said about war times; I have heard all that has been said about justice to mechanics; but let us be just to the country and to the constituency we represent, for you will bear in mind that the forty-two gentlemen who claim here, though eminent gentlemen they may be and deserving consideration, are but a drop in the bucket of the great people who are interested in this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Maryland give way? I think we might as well adjourn. We shall hardly get through with this bill to-day. We are sitting very long.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would be very agreeable to me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REV. RICHARD FULLER.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS asked leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Rev. Richard Fuller.

Leave was granted, and the papers were accordingly withdrawn.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

EXCUSE FROM SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SHANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a proposition to the House. I ask to be discharged from further service on the Committee for the District of Columbia. I feel, under the circumstances, that I can no longer hold that position with profit to the country or honor to myself. Therefore I ask to be discharged from further service on that committee.

The gentleman was accordingly excused.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HILL.

SENATE BILL RETURNED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 16, 1866.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate a bill of the House (H. R. No. 458) granting a pension to Sarah E. Pickell, which was postponed indefinitely on the 13th instant.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

According to the usage of the House, the bill was ordered to be returned to the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly proceeded to the regular order of business, which was the calling of the committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the following cases, and the same were laid on the table:

The petition of Elizabeth J. Brooks, widow of Thomas J. Brooks; and

The petition of George W. Bonnin.

JOANNA WINANS.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans, mother of George W. Winans, acting assistant paymaster of the United States Navy.

The bill was read a first and second time. It grants a pension, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, during her widowhood.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire whether this case is not provided for by the general law.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is not provided for by the general law, the absence not being on sick leave.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What are the peculiar reasons for passing this special bill? I am pretty liberal in regard to this matter of pensions, but I would like to know something of the principles by which the Committee on Invalid Pensions are governed.

Now, I sent a case to the committee where a widow made an application for a pension on the ground that her son had been killed in the service. But a very short time before he was killed he had been married; if he had not been married, then his mother was in that position that she would have been entitled to the pension. His widow afterwards married and thereby forfeited her pension. Now, the mother comes in with her petition and asks that she may be entitled to the pension which she would have been entitled to had not her son been married.

I understand that the committee declined to report a bill of that kind, which was certainly one of the strongest cases I have seen presented to the House. I talked to the Commissioner of Pensions about the case, and while he thought it came within the spirit of the law, it was not within the letter of the law, but he thought it one of the most appropriate cases upon which Congress could legislate.

Now, I desire to know the principle by which the committee are governed, whether it is fish for one and flesh for another.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That has nothing to do with the case under consideration. The report of the committee now before the House stands by itself. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANN HETH.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 201, for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana, who was killed by the rebel Morgan's men while resisting their advance upon Corydon, Indiana, upon the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 9th of July, 1863, to continue during her widowhood.

The report having been read, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARTHA J. WILLEY.

Mr. STILWELL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Martha J. Willey; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides a pension of eight dollars a month, to Mrs. Martha J. Willey, widow of George W. Willey, late a corporal in company F, seventh regiment of New Hampshire volunteers, the pension to commence on the 18th of April, 1865, to continue during her widowhood, and in the event of her marriage or death, to go to the minor children of George W. Willey, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read. It states that George W. Willey enlisted at Dover, New Hampshire, about the 29th of December, 1861, reenlisted at Fernandina, Florida, in 1864, at which time he received a furlough for thirty days, before the expiration of which he died of congestion of the lungs at Dover, New Hampshire, on April 18, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STILWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARY A. PATRICK.

Mr. STILWELL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Patrick; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill grants a pension of twenty dollars per month to Mrs. Mary A. Patrick, widow of Mathew A. Patrick, who was a captain of the first artillery of the United States Army, the pension to commence on the 1st of January, 1860, and to be continued during her widowhood.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the report shall be read.

The report was read. It states that Mathew A. Patrick entered the Army in 1814, as ensign, and died on the 6th of March, 1834, having been promoted to be a captain of the first artillery; his death being caused by disease contracted in the service while on special duty.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the report of the committee sets forth the facts of the case, I would like to know why this lady is not entitled to a pension under the general pension law. It is said that this Patrick died of disease contracted in the service while in the line of his duty. If that is so, why is it that there is any necessity for a special law in this case?

Mr. STILWELL. This old lady is now seventy-four years of age. She never made an application for a pension until this time, and now only asks that the pension to which she is entitled shall date back to January 1, 1860. The surgeon who attended her husband at the time of his death has since died; thus producing a break in the chain of evidence required by the general pension law. But the certificate of the Adjutant General is on file with the papers in this case establishing the facts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We are asked to do something which Congress has rarely if ever done before; grafting a pension to date back before the passage of the bill. We are asked to grant a pension to this lady to date back six years. I do not know that it is of any use whatever to oppose any of these pension cases, no matter what principle may be involved. But I think this is going further than we have ever gone before under any state of circumstances.

Mr. STILWELL. This lady is strictly entitled to a pension from the 6th of March, 1834, when her husband died of disease contracted while in the service. But she does not claim that; only asks for a pension from January, 1860.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If she was entitled to a pension, she has waived her right to it heretofore. And now she comes here, having waived her right, if it ever existed, and asks us to pass a bill to give her a pension dating back for six years.

Mr. STILWELL. She comes here now because she is poor and in indigent circumstances.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no doubt this old lady may be a very meritorious subject for charity. But I contend that we have no right to legislate for charitable purposes. If we do the money in our Treasury might go out a little faster than it now does, and it might possibly give out. I do not see any principle upon which this bill can be passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This case, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat new to me. I was not aware that the committee had agreed to report a bill going back the length of time that this does, or even going back at all. I have been present at all the meetings of the committee that have taken place when I have been in the city, though there have been some meetings held when I was absent from the city. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STILWELL] to consent to the postponement of the bill till the next call of the committee, one week hence. I would like to examine the matter further. I think the bill should be amended.

Mr. STILWELL. A majority of the committee have recommended the reporting of the bill. I have only carried out their instructions.

Mr. PERHAM. I feel that I ought to say that I have no recollection of any action of the committee agreeing that this bill should go back as far as is proposed. As to the merit of the case, I recollect it; and the committee, I believe, were unanimously in favor of a pension; but I am not aware that there was any authority to extend the pension back so far.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If it be in order, I will move to strike out the clause which provides that the pension shall take effect six years back.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STILWELL] is entitled to the floor.

My STILWELL. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. PERHAM] whether he is not satisfied that a pension ought to be granted in this case.

Mr. PERHAM. That was our conclusion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If this lady is entitled to a pension at all, she is entitled to one for thirty-two years back instead of six years. But, as I understand, she asks it for only six years back; and therefore the committee have reported the bill in that form. If justice were done, she should receive a pension from March 6, 1834. The bill provides for giving her a pension for six years back, as she does not ask more.

Mr. PERHAM. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana, I ought to say that our committee have had before them a large number of petitions for the enactment of a general law to give pensions to all who served in the war of 1812. The committee have declined to report favorably on that subject; but we have taken up and reported favorably many individual cases which appealed most strongly to our sympathies, and which we thought would meet the approbation of this House and of the other branch of Congress. They were cases which did not come under the provisions of any general law. They were isolated cases, the circumstances of which, as the committee thought, justified the granting of pensions. In this case, if we grant this lady a pension from the time of the passage of the act until her death, we shall, I think, be treating her as well as she could expect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As I understand, the idea of the committee was to report a bill, corresponding with other pension bills, the pension to take effect from the passage of the act.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope that this bill will not be recommitted. The committee have had the case under consideration, and know as much about the circumstances as they would if they should attempt a reexamination of the case. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to the date when this pension should commence. The bill proposes that it shall commence in 1860. There has been a rule established in the committee that all pensions of this kind shall commence from the passage of the act.

This case does not come within the general pension law, because of the absence of the record evidence of the death of this officer—the certificate of the surgeon. If that could be procured, the pension of this lady would date back from 1834. There is, however, satisfactory evidence in the case that the husband did die from disease contracted in the service; and in order that this case may be disposed of now, I move to amend the bill by striking out the words, "to take effect from and after the passage of the act."

Mr. STILWELL. I will consent to the amendment; and I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STILWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGNES W. LAUGHLIN.

Mr. PERHAM reported back, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a bill (S. No. 241) entitled "An act directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner."

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. SARAH E. WILSON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 252, granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson, widow of William H. Wilson, late acting surgeon United States volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of seventeen dollars per month, to commence from the passage of this bill, and to continue during her widowhood.

It appears from the report, which was also read, that William H. Wilson, the husband of the applicant, was sergeant of company I, eighty-second regiment New York volunteers; that he was a practicing physician and surgeon of good standing in his profession; that at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, he was detailed to act in his professional capacity on the field; that while so acting he was taken prisoner by the enemy; that he remained in the hands of the enemy as a prisoner until the fall of that year, when he was paroled and returned to his home; that at the battle of Antietam, being still unexchanged, he reported to the proper authorities at Washington in his professional capacity, and was sent to the battle-field to assist in caring for the wounded; that he discharged that duty faithfully and well, and while in the discharge thereof contracted the disease whereof he died March 22, 1863.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. EMERANCE GOULER.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 260, granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mrs. Emerance Gouler, widow of Charles Gouler, late a private in company F, ninth New Hampshire volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from the passage of this bill, and to continue during her widowhood.

It appears from the report, which was also read, that Charles Gouler, the husband of the petitioner, was a private in company F, ninth regiment New Hampshire volunteers, and was admitted to Satterlee United States general hospital, Pennsylvania, on the 28th of May, 1864, suffering from fever. That on the 8th of October following he received a pass from said hospital to leave the premises for a few hours, and that no information was afterward received concerning him until November 29, 1864, when it was stated by soldiers that he had been drowned. Upon an investigation by a coroner over the body of a soldier found in the Delaware river at Pine street wharf, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, October 14, 1864, he was identified by the pass and other papers found on the body.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If I understand this case, Mr. Speaker, this party was a soldier who was accidentally drowned. If that be so, I do not know why we should make this an exceptional case. If we are going to act on it we should pass a general law.

Mr. PERHAM. There is a whole class of cases which we have considered. I do not know whether this is one of them. The facts of one case are that a sick soldier was granted a sick furlough and was sent to New York in company with six or seven hundred soldiers. The vessel which he was on was sunk with nearly all on board. But I am not sure that is this case, though very much like it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to bring to the attention of the honorable gentleman from Illinois that we are to pass upon these special cases which are not included under the general law. This case is upon a like state of facts referred to by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I ask the Clerk to read the report, so that the members of the House may hear it.

The report was again read.

Mr. PERHAM. This case has been examined carefully. It was discussed at length by the Senate, was passed and sent to us. The committee here, after investigation, approved it. It is now before the House, and I think ought to be passed. This man had a fever, contracted in the service, and if he had died in the hospital there would have been no difficulty about a pension. He received a furlough for five or six hours, and on being missed his body was found in the river.

Mr. BINGHAM. He was sick when he went out.

Mr. PERHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not see upon what ground you will grant this pension. This man did not lose his life while in the line of his duty.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not think we should look narrowly into these cases. This soldier was suffering with fever and was in hospital. If, instead of perishing in the river, he had died in hospital the pension would have been granted under the law. He had a temporary furlough, and was found dead in the river. No one is able to say how he lost his life.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there is no fact of that kind appears on the face of the report.

Mr. BINGHAM. The fact has been stated in the hearing of the House by the chairman of the committee, that he was suffering under his disease.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I presume the chairman of the committee knows nothing more about it than is stated in the report, and that states nothing of the kind.

Mr. BINGHAM. I take it for granted that he knows what he states—that he was still suffering and got leave of temporary absence, and during that time he was found dead in the river. No one will deny that if he had died in the hospital his case would have gone on the pension-roll.

Mr. PERHAM. In regard to his suffering in consequence of disease, I have only to say this: the practice in the hospital is to discharge soldiers whenever they are in a condition to be discharged, and I suppose that this soldier was not in a condition to be discharged.

I have no desire to discuss this matter at further length. I am willing to submit it to the House. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask for a division on its passage.

On the passage of the bill no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. PERHAM, and WASHBURNE of Illinois.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 38.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative to make a quorum, and the bill is accordingly passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 184) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue-cutters; and An act (H. R. No. 25) for the relief of Thomas Hurly.

ORGANIZATION OF THE PENSION OFFICE.

Mr. PERHAM. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have instructed me to report back House bill No. 278, in amendment of the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute therefor.

The bill was read. It makes the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions equal to that of the Commissioner of Patents, and the salary of the chief clerk of the Pension Office equal to that of the chief clerk of the Patent Office.

The amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions shall be $4,000 per annum, and the salary of the chief clerk of the Pension Office shall be $2,500 per annum.

*SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint, from the fourth-class clerks in the Pension Office, one chief examiner of Army invalid pension claims, one chief examiner of Army pension claims of widows, mothers, and orphans, and one chief examiner of Navy pension claims; each of said chief examiners shall be allowed $200 per annum in addition to the salaries already allowed to clerks of the fourth class: *Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to authorize the appointment of a larger number of fourth-class clerks than is now provided by law, including the examiners aforesaid.

Mr. PERHAM. I am directed by the committee to move to amend the substitute by striking out the second section.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would consent to have this bill recommitteed, and have the bill, substitute, and amendment printed.

Mr. PERHAM. They are all printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope he will not press the bill this morning.

Mr. PERHAM. I wish to state briefly the considerations which have actuated the committee in making the recommendation which they do make. It will be seen by the substitute, as it now stands, that it only applies to the Commissioner of Pensions and to the chief clerk. The salary of the Commissioner of Pensions now is $3,000, and that of the chief clerk $2,000. I need not say to any gentleman who has had business with the pension department, that the Commissioner of Pensions is one of the hardest worked officers in the whole of the Departments of the Government. And I need not say that there has been a very great increase of business in that bureau during the last three or four years, and that it becomes necessary for the Commissioner, in order to a proper discharge of his duties, to work very much outside of the regular business hours, even well into the night, and that there is very great responsibility devolved upon him.

We are distributing now through this bureau something more than fifteen million dollars per annum—more than the whole expense of carrying on the Government up to the time of John Quincy Adams's Administration. The bills that are now in process of passage in Congress will increase the disbursements to more than twenty million dollars, and this is to be paid out in sums averaging less than one hundred dollars each in all parts of the country, and in almost every town in the country, making, aside from the necessity of a careful examination of all the cases that came before the Commissioner, a vast amount of business in keeping all these accounts with such a large number of persons, scattered over so very large a territory.

It is very true that the applications for pensions may now have reached the maximum and that there may not be so large a number of applications for the next year as there has been for the last year. But it is also true that only the plain cases have been disposed of. There are a large number of cases remaining that are different entirely, cases that require a great deal of investigation and very much research, to which the Commissioner of Pensions must give his careful attention.

Many of the heads of bureaus have deputies, but we give him none. He is obliged to attend to all his duties himself. When the salaries of these heads of bureaus were first established, they were just one half the salaries of Cabinet officers, $3,000, the salaries of Cabinet officers being then $6,000. We have increased the pay of Cabinet officers to $8,000, and this bill proposes to increase the pay of the Commissioner of Pensions to the same extent, giving him just one half the salary of a Cabinet officer, as we were in the habit of doing formerly.

Now, we found, when we came to examine the salaries of these heads of bureaus, that the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, for instance, receives a salary of $6,000 a year. I am not familiar with the duties of that officer, but I presume they are very light as compared with those of the Commissioner of Pensions. We give the Comptroller of the Currency, who has a deputy to aid him, $5,000. We give the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who also has a deputy, $4,000.

When we come to the War Department, the heads of bureaus there, I believe, are generally brigadier generals, receiving the pay and commutation of brigadier generals, which, I think, amounts to $6,000 per annum. If I am wrong, some military gentleman will correct me.

When we come to the Navy Department, the head of the Bureau of Yards and Docks receives $4,000. And then the Commissioner of Patents receives $4,500.

Under all the circumstances the committee have come to the conclusion that it is very proper that the pay of this officer, who is obliged to stay here during the whole year, during the hot as well as the cold seasons of the year, and attending to his duties so assiduously, as it is necessary he should do to discharge them, shall be increased.

So far as the chief clerk of the Pension Office is concerned, we give the chief clerk of the Patent Office $2,500. I suppose the duties of the chief clerk in the Pension Office may be as arduous as those performed there.

There is another fact connected with this matter. While you give many of the other heads of bureaus deputies, you give the Commissioner of Pensions no deputy, and therefore the chief clerk must be a man competent to perform the duties of the Commissioner in case of his absence or sickness.

The committee came to the conclusion that we need a man whose services are worth this salary. The chief clerk now is obliged to assist the Commissioner very much in his duties, and in case of the sickness or absence of the Commissioner would be expected to take his place and perform his duties.

The committee have recommended the passage of this bill, believing that on the whole it is about right, and I am willing to submit the question to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me say one word.

Mr. PERHAM. I will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have no fault to find with the manner in which the present Commissioner of Pensions performs his duties. I believe that he is a very faithful, conscientious, and able officer, and a very accommodating gentleman to do business with. But my point is against increasing these salaries. We are going on increasing, one after another, the salaries of all these men about Washington. Why, sir, we have, within a few years, increased the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of War and of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. And now here is a proposition to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions to $4,000, being an increase of $1,000 a year.

The next thing that will come up, and with just as much merit as this, will be a proposition to increase the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And my friend from California [Mr. BIDWELL] is also very much to blame for not having brought in a bill to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the most laborious officer in the whole Government. And if we can judge from the votes of the House, he is decidedly one of the most meritorious officers that we now have.

I object to this whole thing upon the ground that we have already gone too far in the way of increasing the salaries of these officers. If we are to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, we ought for the same reason to go on and increase the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill will go over till tomorrow.

COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. HIGBY. I find myself under the necessity of leaving the city for some days, and therefore I ask that the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, may be called after the rest of the select committees have been called, instead of being called in its regular order.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the concurrent resolution of the Senate concerning the sale of liquor in the Capitol building, and agreed to the request of the House for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Messrs. WILSON, SHERMAN, and GUTHRIE, the committee on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution No. 102, for the relief of Alexander Thompson, late United States consul at Maranhão.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 190) to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SCHENCK called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The following section was under consideration:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the infantry regiments herein provided for shall consist of the first ten regiments of infantry, of ten companies each, now in service; of twenty-seven regiments to be formed by adding two new companies to each of the twenty-seven battalions comprising the remaining nine regiments; of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps; and of eight regiments of colored men, to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided, to be known as the United States colored troops.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. DAVIS, to amend the section by striking out the following words:

Of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment now proposed to this fourth section would strike out all that portion of the section which relates to the organization of the Veteran Reserve corps. I desire, before any vote is taken upon the amendment, that the House shall fully understand the length and breadth of that proposition.

I stated at the beginning of the consideration of this bill, that in fixing the number of infantry regiments we have adopted the idea of the War Department and of the Lieutenant General, though some of us believed that the number of regiments should be greater. We have settled upon the number here named as perhaps the number most proper to be selected under all the lights we now have, and under all the necessities of the country. And therefore we provide in the House bill that there shall be fifty-five regiments of infantry.

That number is to be made up as follows: first, of the ten regiments now in existence in the old Army. Then there are nine regiments, consisting each of three battalions of eight companies, which regiments were created during the war. It is proposed to continue those nine regiments, and by adding two companies to each battalion, to make a regiment of ten companies of each of these battalions, or twenty-seven regiments in all from these nine regiments. These twenty-seven regiments, with the old ten regiments will give thirty-seven regiments of the fifty-five to be provided.

That leaves eighteen of the fifty-five regiments still to be accounted for. Of these ten are to be regiments which shall constitute the Veteran Reserve corps, and eight regiments are to be made up of colored troops.

Now, the proposition is to reduce the whole number of infantry regiments by striking out the ten regiments to be organized as a Veteran Reserve corps, and the reasons have been assigned, by gentlemen who have discussed this subject, why this should be done. I think, however, the general reason for the opposition to this corps has not been assigned.

Originally fifty-five regiments of infantry were proposed, with the assent of all persons representing the interests of the regular Army. But when it was found that the House insisted that ten of these should be regiments officered by those who have been wounded in the service of their country, it was suddenly discovered that there were too many regiments of infantry provided for. And it was then proposed to drop five regiments, bringing the number down to fifty regiments, the other five to be added to the regular Army in the ordinary way.

Now, I am not at all surprised at the course which has been pursued here, and I shall not be surprised at any course which may hereafter be pursued toward this feature of the bill of the House. There is a general hostility cultivated, pressed, urged, spread around Congress, coming from those who are opposed to any Veteran Reserve corps at all. And it is not to be supposed but what it will have its influence and be felt here.

Before I speak of that, however, I want it distinctly understood what is proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. Gentlemen have spoken as if the committee were proposing to transfer the present Veteran Reserve corps bodily to the Army. There is no such provision in the bill. The present Veteran Reserve corps consists of twenty-four regiments, of whom there remains yet in service about six hundred officers, some four hundred of whom are employed at present in the Freedmen's Bureau. What is proposed by the committee is not that there shall be a Veteran Reserve corps of twenty-four regiments, but that of the fifty-five regiments of infantry, ten shall constitute a Veteran Reserve corps, and that they shall be officered, not by taking exclusively the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, but by selections from among them, upon proper and thorough examination, and from among all other officers who have been wounded in the Union cause during the rebellion. In this way, officers are to be provided for this limited number of ten regiments. Before gentlemen conclude to vote for or against the proposition to strike out these lines from the fourth section, I invite their attention to the provision contained in the fifth section:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

It is, therefore, a misrepresentation, or at the least a misapprehension, to speak as if there were to be a transfer of the Veteran Reserve corps. The bill contemplates no such thing. The provision is for the creation of ten regiments out of the fifty-five, instead of the old corps of twenty-four regiments, these ten regiments to be officered by selection from among the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps and all other officers and soldiers wounded in the Union cause in the suppression of this rebellion, the only requirement being that they shall be found competent upon examination.

These officers of the Veteran Reserve corps might well say, "It is hard that we should be required to undergo a reexamination, having once passed an examination when we received our appointments and were confirmed by the Senate." But these men do not ask for themselves, nor is it asked for them, that they shall be exempt from this reexamination. But the door being thrown open for all wounded officers and soldiers of the Union Army, it is proposed that they shall come in with the rest, and that from the whole the officers for these ten regiments shall be selected.

Again, how are the men for the regiment to be obtained? Generally by recruiting, as in other cases. But there is in one of the later sections of this bill a provision for obtaining and providing for men who have suffered wounds or contracted disability in service. At the close of the tenth section is the following provision:

It shall be competent to enlist men for the service who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States, or who have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, provided it shall be found, on medical inspection, that by such wounds or disability they are not unfitted for efficiency in garrison or other light duty; and such men, when enlisted, shall be assigned to service exclusively in the regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps.

Those three provisions in these different and appropriate sections, show, taken together, how we would constitute this Veteran Reserve corps, to consist of these ten regiments. There is full provision made by which officers and men alike who have served their country and have been wounded or otherwise contracted disability shall not on that account be debarred from coming with their meed of help to the country in doing such duty as they may be fitted to perform, because they would be unable to undergo successfully that medical inspection which, both as to officers and men, is a part of the inquiry into their fitness when they are presented for service; but the rule being relaxed in their case, they are to be received notwithstanding their wounds or disability.

If you do not have a provision of that kind, both as to officers and men, what will be the consequence? No man who has been wounded in your cause can ever expect to be admitted into your service, whether he be an officer or a private, because the medical inspection always on inquiry into his fitness will exclude both officers and men unless you have some such provision.

But gentlemen say, these men being wounded ought not to be employed—let them live upon their pension; let them go into the pursuits of civil life. Let me apply that to those gentlemen who, being themselves already established in the regular Army, would exclude these wounded officers or volunteers. When one of them becomes wounded does he wish to go out of the Army upon his pension? When one of them becomes wounded does he wish to be relieved from all duty, from light duty, and receiving such entire pay as the law gives him? You never hear an argument of that kind come from that quarter.

But they say that it is to legislate a body of men into the regular Army who were only temporarily employed, passing by the question what these men were taught to expect in the Veteran Reserve corps when they were given the privilege of remaining in the Army or not. Let me say if we do that it is no more than what we are doing for the regular Army. What are these new regiments made up of? The nine regiments of the old Army. They were regiments of three battalions each, raised by law for the rebellion, and their term will expire by the limitation of law. Why, every one, whether he belongs to the School of West Point or was appointed from civil life, would be turned out unless such a provision is made as that we make in the bill. When gentlemen make an objection of that kind they do not see how far it will go. If you cannot legislate the Veteran Reserve corps or any selection of them into your Army because there is bad policy in it, then it is bad policy to have twenty-seven new regiments made up of the nine old regiments raised only for the war. I expect these gentlemen have forgotten that.

Who are these wounded officers? Let us look at their character, as they will be spoken of disparagingly here and elsewhere in reference to points connected with this debate. There is a great misapprehension, I expect, in relation to them. They were appointed to the Veteran Reserve corps in 1863, 1864, and 1865. In 1863, when this organization was first begun, the aggregate of officers appointed was six hundred and eighty. They were appointed without examination by transfer from the volunteer service.

It was afterward determined to give a better character to the corps, and it was provided they should undergo an examination and be confirmed by the Senate. On that examination, of the six hundred and eighty appointed about one third failed and were dropped from the rolls, leaving the number of appointments in 1863 at four hundred and forty-six. In 1864 near four hundred appointments were made after rigid examination.

In 1865, at the close of the war, only fifty-five were appointed, making the total appointed and confirmed by the Senate eight hundred and ninety. About six hundred remain in the service who were regularly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned. Of these six hundred about four hundred are on duty with General Howard in the Freedmen's Bureau. I think it no breach of confidence to say I have his assurance—although like all other classes of officers there may be some who are unfortunate, who will be weeded out on examination—yet as a body he has no better, more efficient, capable, and intelligent officers than those sent to him for duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is the testimony of General Howard, and I think it is a better sort of testimony than that of gentlemen who think that one-armed men are not fit to be employed in the service of the United States, and who would dispense with any further committal of trust to that gallant and distinguished officer who sympathizes with and is in favor of providing for those who have suffered in the cause of their country.

But it may be asked, why did not these veterans return to their duty when they so far recovered as to be fit for any duty whatever? The answer is most obvious. In about nine cases out of ten it arose from the fact that there was an order of the Department in 1862, called the sixty day order, which provided that if an officer on account of wounds or disease should be absent sixty days or upwards, his name should be stricken from the rolls and his place supplied by another appointment. In this way men who were wounded and who ultimately recovered far enough to be able to be employed profitably in the service fell out of the Army entirely. They found their places filled on their return to duty.

But, sir, I was going to speak of the character of these men who are spoken of as unfit for service, men who have found their way into this Veteran corps as "loafers" so called. I happen to have among my papers a statement of the percentage of the number of the different character of the wounds received by these men against whom this tilt is now made, and I find that the percentage of wounds received by the present officers of the corps is as follows:

Those of them who have had one wound constitute thirty-five per cent. of the whole; those who have suffered from two wounds constitute twenty-five per cent.; those who have had three wounds in the service constitute nine per cent.; those who have had four wounds one and a half per cent.; those who have received five wounds, one per cent.; those who have suffered amputation of a leg, ten per cent.; those who have suffered amputation of an arm, nine per cent.; the number not wounded, but admitted because of disease or other causes disabling from duty, only nine and a half per cent.

And yet people are talking about these soldiers as though they were made up of men who had no claim upon the country by reason of having actually served in the field of battle, and of having suffered in their persons by being exposed to the bullets and bayonets of the enemy.

But all these remarks are unnecessary when you take into account the fact that after all you are going to select from the whole number, that after all you throw the door wide open to all who have been wounded; and inasmuch as that is the fact, you bring it back to the reply to the general argument, that a wounded man is not fit for duty and a wounded officer cannot properly have command.

Sir, the true reason leaked out from a remark which dropped from one of the gentlemen from New York, which I have heard repeated again and again outside, and which is in fact based upon a general opposition on the part of those now constituting the regular Army to having any Reserve corps made up of wounded men, and, as far as possible, of wounded officers. The argument is this: that all the easy places, such as garrison duties and station duties in towns, will probably fall to the share of this corps, and the able-bodied gentlemen of the regular Army will have to rough it out on the frontier posts, in the field, or at hard work.

Well, sir, the only reply I have to make to that is this, that if any class of men deserve the easy places, deserve to be put on recruiting duty, in garrison along the coasts and as guards, where ever they can properly perform that duty, and not to be sent out to report on the frontier, it is exactly these men who have not only had an opportunity to prove themselves, but have actually proved themselves, brave soldiers in the cause of their country, and have got their disability in that way. And, so long as that disability does not unfit them for a reasonable share of profitable duty, I say, employ them in that profitable way and give them the benefit of thus being provided for as some compensation for that which they have undergone. If anybody is entitled to easy places, it is these men.

Ah! but it is said they would not be fit for the duty. I suppose not; I suppose not. A fellow with one arm could not make the salute properly! A fellow with one eye could not maneuver his opera-glass properly! A fellow with one leg could not lead the "German;" he could not waltz properly, even with the aid of a piece of cork to supply his deficiency!

Now, I trust that all such arguments will be put aside. I trust that while we throw the doors wide open to all men of the volunteers and of the regular Army, and endeavor to build up a good and sufficient army upon a liberal system, we shall give every one a chance; that there will be no more of these miserable and narrow attacks upon and attempts at exclusion of those who, whatever be their merits otherwise, have at least proved that they have been in the way of danger.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I sympathize very heartily in the line of remarks of my distinguished colleague, and I am earnestly in favor of retaining in the service, as an act of mere national justice, this Veteran Reserve corps, but I do desire, before my colleague sits down, that he shall give the House the benefit of whatever knowledge he may have upon this point. It is a common objection in the Army against the retention of this Veteran Reserve corps that practically it will result in having ten regiments of officers and very few men. I understand that it is said that the experience of the country heretofore in this matter has indicated pretty strongly that it will not be practicable to have these regiments filled with men.

Now, I would like my distinguished colleague to tell the House what there is that is known bearing upon that subject, and whether it would be practicable to fill up these regiments and keep them filled up; for that is the great point, I take it, that is made against this feature of the bill. I understand that it has been very strongly made at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very glad to have had my attention called to that point by my colleague, and I shall but be repeating my reference to the tenth section of the bill when I indicate how that difficulty is provided for.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The difficulty is said to exist in the fact that you cannot get men to fill these regiments.

Mr. SCHENCK. If you can get men for any regiments you can get them for these, with the additional advantage that men recruited for the general service are eligible to employment in these ten regiments. Any man recruited for the Army may be assigned to duty in one of these ten regiments, whether he has been wounded in the service or not. But in addition to that we throw these ten regiments open so as to authorize the enlistment, which otherwise we could not permit under medical inspection, of men partially disabled by wounds, and provide that they may be transferred to these ten regiments.

The consequence will be practically this: if you get enough wounded men to fill the ten regiments you will have these regiments composed exclusively and entirely of men who, to some extent, are invalids or cripples, but not as much so as to be unfit for duty. But if you do not get enough such men to fill the ten regiments you can fill them up from the rest of the Army.

The tenth section provides what shall be done with the recruits sent to the general rendezvous, and it then goes on to say:

It shall be competent to enlist men for the service who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States, or who have been disabled by disease contracted in such service.

If there were not such a provision you could not enlist one of these men. Men who have lost an eye or lost a finger or an arm, men who have been injured in any way, would be rejected by the medical inspector. But we provide against that and say that any wounded man or officer shall be eligible, with this further proviso:

Provided, It shall be found, on medical inspection, that by such wounds or disability they are not unfitted for efficiency in garrison or other light duty; and such men, when enlisted, shall be assigned to service exclusively in the regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand from the remarks just made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that he thinks it possible at least, and not only possible but probable, from our past experience, that these ten regiments will not be filled and kept full by invalids of the Army. In that case, he suggests that these ten regiments are to be filled as the other regiments are filled; that is, by men who can pass a rigid examination. I desire to ask that gentleman whether that is not likely to bring together two classes, and to assign the better class to duties to which they ought not to be assigned. As I understand, one of the results contemplated by this bill is that the invalid regiments are to be assigned to certain specific and lighter duties.

Mr. SCHENCK. My answer to that is simply this: if you do not receive any man who has been wounded, then all these light duties have yet to be performed by somebody. For in that case all these ten regiments and all the other regiments will be filled up with able-bodied men, who must perform light duty, garrison duty, and all the other kinds of duty which our soldiers are called on to perform. Therefore there is nothing gained or lost one way or the other, except that the course proposed by the committee will enable you to receive a class of men who otherwise will be excluded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the gentleman whether as a matter of experience, as well as within the range of reasonable probability, it is not true that an army of fifty thousand men, composed of those who will pass a rigid examination, will not necessarily furnish, in the troubles and trials even of a time of peace, all the men disabled and incompetent for active military service who may be necessary for all the light duties of the peace establishment.

And I would also ask still further, whether, considering the extended and varied character of this country, and its variety of climate, it is not necessary in order to secure the physical and moral welfare of the Army that there should be capacity in the Commander-in-Chief to transfer regiments and brigades from one portion of the country to another. And is not the natural and necessary effect of this bill to place the able-bodied and vigorous portion of the Army in unhealthy and exposed and deleterious situations which will undermine in five or ten years the best and most vigorous physical constitutions?

Mr. SCHENCK. To that I answer "No."

The SPEAKER. The second fifteen minutes of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] have expired.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be again extended.

Mr. SCHENCK. My time has been much taken up by interruptions and explanations. Hereafter when occupying the floor I will decline to yield to any one.

The time of Mr. SCHENCK was extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] proceeds, I desire to state to him that there is one objection in the minds of some gentlemen, not pertaining necessarily to this section, but which still has some bearing upon the votes which we are to give. And while I do not entertain the objection that others do, I desire some information.

Some gentlemen believe that the bill as it now stands is intended to include, first, all the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, and then only to go among other wounded men for officers of these regiments. I do not myself so understand the bill, but others think so. But I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if there will be any objection on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs when we come to the next section, the fifth section, to strike out the words "by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and," and thereby leave it open to all wounded men.

The section now reads:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and by appointment from any officers and soldiers who have been wounded, &c.

If amended as I suggest it will then read:

Shall be officered by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers who have been wounded, &c.

That would remove all doubt on the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that I should make any objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that is precisely the meaning of the bill now. As the bill now stands, it is that this Veteran Reserve corps is to be officered by selection from the present officers of the corps and any other officers and soldiers who have been wounded. These officers having already been prominent before the country, having undergone their examination, and having been appointed, confirmed, and commissioned, would naturally be looked to among those who are to supply the officers for these ten regiments. And hence it will do no harm, one way or the other, I suppose, to leave out the words indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] let me say, in the first place, that your garrisons are organizations. You send a company, or half a company, or two or three companies, or a regiment, to a post or to a fort. The gentleman says that there will always be, in an army of fifty thousand men or more, a great number wounded or disabled by the accidents or casualties of the service to make up these garrisons. But they will have no organization. They do not get sick by companies or by regiments. You cannot, therefore, send them, with their proper officers, to perform garrison duty. The reply to the whole matter is that you cannot garrison your posts by selecting one man from one regiment, another from another regiment, two from a third, and an officer from a fourth to command them. So that this substitute suggested for a Veteran Reserve corps is simply impracticable and is utterly inconsistent with military discipline and military practice.

Then, again, the inquiry is, whether the able-bodied men will not necessarily be sent off to places where they will be exposed to the deleterious influences of climate; whether they ought not to be changed. Of course they should be changed from time to time, and they may be changed. As a great part of the peace duty will be garrison duty, it is probable that these regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps will be occasionally changed from post to post, from fort to fort, from guard duty at one point to guard duty at another, from garrison duty to guard duty; and from guard duty to garrison duty. So also with the able-bodied troops; so also with the remaining forty-five regiments of infantry who will not constitute the Veteran Reserve corps. They will be on duty sometimes on the Pacific coast, sometimes upon the Florida coast, sometimes along the Indian frontier, and sometimes elsewhere. There will be room enough for changes and transfers of all, notwithstanding the continuance of the Veteran Reserve corps; for there will be a vast deal more of garrison and post and guard duty to be performed than can possibly be performed by these ten regiments.

Now, as to the efficiency of the Veteran Reserve corps for such purposes, let us see what the present corps has done. A portion of that corps was sent out to Johnson's Island at a time when other troops had been withdrawn; and during their service as guard to that rebel prison the weather was sometimes so cold that the men froze at their posts. This shows that the members of this corps have been employed for duty at inclement places as well as able-bodied men. Men of this corps, mounted as cavalry, were sent up through Pennsylvania at the time of the riots in the mining region; and they scouted the country for miles. Again, they were mounted as cavalry and scouted the country in front of the fortifications of Washington toward the close of the war. They guarded the public property here at Washington at every point. At the time of the approach of the rebel enemy to this city in the summer of 1864, they occupied and garrisoned the northeast fortifications of the city, from Fort Stevens entirely around to Fort Reno. They were in conflict with the enemy. Many of them, although they had suffered wounds or contracted disease in former battles, were able to renew the fight, to take again their position as efficient soldiers; and many of them suffered even unto death in the battles which occurred when Washington was thus threatened. Their conduct upon that occasion received, as it merited, great praise. I might go on multiplying notices of the services of this Veteran Reserve corps, showing that it is a slander upon officers and men alike to say that they have not performed their duty, and performed it well.

Now, sir, it may be said that these men are men who have gone from civil life into volunteer organizations, and that now we pass them over to the regular Army. I admit that this is so; but if it be a sound objection, it is one which extends to all other volunteers.

What is your army now? It is an army made up largely from civil life. I have taken the trouble to have a table prepared to show how the present line officers, field and company officers, of the regiments in the regular Army have been appointed. I find it is by no means a West Point army. West Point has gone further up. West Point gets for the most part the bureaus. West Point is in the Department. West Point has the general supervision of the whole. But when it comes to the line officers, field and company officers, in the several regiments, I find of the thirty colonels twenty-one were educated at the United States Military Academy, eight not graduates of West Point, and one vacancy. When you come to lieutenant colonels, there are twenty-five graduates and five who were not graduates of West Point. Of the majors, fifty-five were graduates of West Point and twenty-one are from civil life. When you get to the captains, you find that only one hundred and thirty-one are from West Point, while three hundred and three of the present Army never have been at the United States Military Academy. Of the first lieutenants, seventy-nine have been at West Point and three hundred and sixty-eight have never been there. Of the second lieutenants, fifteen have been at West Point and twenty-nine have never been there, there being a great many vacancies. I find in the present Army, of field and company officers one thousand and sixty, and of these only three hundred and twenty-six were graduates of the United States Military Academy, while seven hundred and thirty-four never had that advantage of military education, and have only been taught by commanding troops in the field and by such attention as they have been able to bestow on the subject.

You would exclude these men who in the volunteer service have been wounded, and yet when these nine new regiments were made up the officers who were appointed in great part had nothing to commend them except political influence to get them their places. There are men in your regular Army who never until they were put into that Army served anywhere. I do not complain of this. You had to make a sudden expansion of your regular Army amid the exigencies of the rebellion, while yet there were no men wounded, no men who had practical experience and who had seen service, to put in these places. The consequence was they were filled up, these original and other vacancies, by men from civil life without any experience whatever. These men are not to be legislated out, but are to be left for what they may have done since. When we come to the present Army in the field you take the men and there is no inquiry to prove who they are or what they are, no matter to what organization they have belonged, but you object that this is legislating a class into the Army, that it is taking men in a body and transferring them to a position to which they are not entitled.

I have occupied more of the attention of the House than I intended, but whatever I had to say might as well have been said now.

Mr. CONKLING obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will allow me. Mr. CONKLING. I have been waiting a long while to say something myself.

Mr. HALE. In justice to the officers of the nine new regiments, the fact should be stated that those regiments were organized within sixty days after the war broke out, so that they could not be officered from those who had seen service in the field.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded we ought not to petrify the Veteran Reserve corps in the permanent military system of the country. This conviction remains unchanged by the earnest appeal made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs; unchanged by the extraordinary efforts which have been made from the outside to convert this House to the opinion that the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps en masse ought to be taken up and preferred before all the other officers and men to whom the country owes so much.

Even if the proposition were free from favoritism; even if all the heroic and disabled were to be allowed to compete alike for the benefits proposed, it seems to me when I remember the object of the bill before us that such a measure would be of doubtful wisdom. We are not upon a bill providing pensions or relief, we are upon an Army bill; a bill to lay anew the foundations of the regular Army, to vitalize, to invigorate, to utilize it. The objects are efficiency and economy; and making the provision due to sufferers in the late war is another matter, not less in importance, certainly not in duty, but separate and distinct from this.

Those whose experience and observation entitle them to instruct me will not deem me in error when I say that it is at least a question whether an invalid corps should ever exist in a permanent military establishment. I mean, of course, a purposely created invalid corps.

The laws of decay in peace, and of destruction in war, multiply invalids fast enough, and it is the mission of ingenuity and of duty to prevent the members of an army from becoming invalids, and to provide for the ever sickening and ever suffering and ever failing. Even this task is, from its nature, too difficult to be well performed.

With the utmost rigor of examination as to physical fitness at the time of enlistments, and with the best sanitary regulations afterward, which the most favored service admits of, the percentage of human ailments is so great, that in the Army, as in every other walk of life, a large proportion of the whole is constantly unfit for hardship or activity.

Beyond all this, the military life makes regiments and whole commands the sufferers from seasons and climates and hardships and campaigns, from which they must have relief by change and rest.

The necessities of a soldier's life require all the relief that the best system will allow, and the opportunity to afford this relief has been found inconsistent with allotting light service, or any special service, perpetually to one portion of an army and hard duty of the same kind perpetually to the other.

This is no new idea. It is not started to be applied to the proposed Veteran Reserve corps. Experience declared it long ago; and it has been recently and pointedly declared for our instruction in the very matter in hand.

I suppose it is no secret that the public authorities recently caused to be convened in this city a number of the first generals of the age. The object of the convention was to consult as to the best disposition to be made of the military establishment of the country, now that the war is over, and to consider and devise the best legislative provisions in reference to the regular or permanent Army. These generals were those whose large experience and whose professional eminence selected them as the best advisers, and whose official station makes them the persons to execute the law to be enacted. They came together; the Lieutenant General, General Sherman, General Thomas, General Meade, all came. General Sheridan, and others, did not come. This group of men, so illustrious and so skilled, studied the whole subject, and presented their views in writing. The measures they deemed wisest were embodied in a bill which they approved. That bill was introduced in the Senate, carefully considered in committee there. It became the subject of conference and correspondence between the committee of the Senate and the officers who had recommended it. It was elaborately considered in the Senate, and passed with but little alteration, and came to us. Here it went to the Military Committee, and there it stays.

In its place we have a bill presented which contains various things, which were specially and pointedly condemned by the officers to whom I have referred, by the committee of the Senate, and by the Senate also. There may be reasons for this, though we have not yet heard them.

Beside the bill, however, which these officers blocked out, they made a record of their recommendations. One was upon the point now before us. I will read it. It is, as will be discovered, in answer to a communication sent them with a bill, to which had been added a provision creating a Veteran Reserve corps.

The paper is signed by Generals Sherman, Meade, and Thomas, and I am not sure whether by General Grant also.

"The only essential change proposed in the Army bill is to omit the Veteran Reserve corps altogether."

This is the reason they give:

"In any army, no matter what pains be taken in selecting recruits, when we come to put them into service experience teaches that nearly thirty per cent. fail by reason of the ordinary imperfections of human nature. Now, if eight regiments of the fifty be taken from the invalids, or men of impaired strength, we add fifteen per cent., or in all forty-five per cent. of invalids, which is too large a proportion. In the end it is cheaper to provide directly, by way of pensions, for this class of soldiers. If the officers of the Veteran Reserve have a good record and restored health, they can be appointed just as other officers of the volunteer army."

I hope the gentleman will remember the subject with which these generals were dealing when they expressed that opinion, and the subject with which we are dealing when we listen to it. I ask gentlemen to remember what seems to have been sometimes forgotten to-day, namely, that the bill is not one to establish a military asylum or to provide for disabled men, but to invigorate and compact the armies of the Republic. Looking to the object in view, they say that an invalid corps, however organized, is a mistake. Why? Do we not all know; do we not all see obvious reasons, some of which were suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL?] Is not the reason of the matter so plain that even those of us who can lay no claim to military attainments may see and affirm it? Passing over the thirty per cent. of disability which inheres in every army, however well selected, we see the need of relief duty, of light service like garrison and post duty to recruit the weary and the worn.

Regiments sent to Texas, for example, and to other distant parts even in ordinary times, become worn, jaded, and impoverished, and there must be some relief for them, and for companies and battalions requiring change of climate and life. While post and garrison service are left open to be allotted from time to time among those most in need of the rest thus afforded, one hand is made to wash the other, the service is performed, and there are always enough and to spare of those whose hardships, and absence far away, and actual bodily condition, not only deserve but require repose and the relaxation which light service gives. If they are not to be thus relieved they must have seasons of entire uselessness and idleness accorded them.

I am assured by gentlemen who would not be questioned here as military authorities, that a great element of the morale of the Army, of the spirit and content of the Army, is the fact that all know that each regiment and battalion and company will have its fair turn at home duty as well as distant duty, at the relaxations which repair as well as the trials which jade. This has been always the rule in our service, and it has never been violated, I believe, in legislation.

It was in no way violated by the formation for the time being of the existing Veteran Reserve corps.

The gentleman from Illinois said yesterday that this corps was given reason to suppose that it was created permanently. I say to him, if he will look into the fact he will find it precisely otherwise. The Invalid corps, as it was first called, was created not by statute but by an order which I have before me. It was created for a temporary purpose. What was it? It was created as an auxiliary to the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General, which bureau, by the terms of the statute creating it, died with the war. This corps was created to guard prisoners, to assist in drafting, in short, to perform duties rather of police than of war at draft rendezvous, and elsewhere. It was created for these purposes, and for these purposes alone. There was a necessity for it, and that necessity was as temporary as it was great, while the war continued, and while every able-bodied man in the service was needed at the front. The necessity has passed, the duties for which the corps was formed are no longer to be done. Of course everybody foresaw that the purpose was temporary, and everybody knew, who knew anything about it, that the organization was not to be permanent.

The Government has by act and word held but one language on this point, and no expectations have been created that any set of officers were to be preferred to others in the final reorganization.

I should like to make further observations upon the questionable expediency of any permanently established special invalid corps, but time does not permit. Let us assume that such a corps if impartially constructed, so as to give all disabled officers a fair chance, would be valuable and wise. Then why should those who have already enjoyed advantages over their companions in arms be still further favored? I ask this question because in spite of the language of section five and of the interpretation put upon it by the chairman of the Military Committee, I believe the practical effect will be virtually to prefer en masse a large portion of the officers of the present corps to other wounded and disabled officers and soldiers.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no such thing in the bill, and the gentleman either cannot read or will not understand.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not get too energetic. He has had three extensions of his time, and has expressed himself so fully that he should be content for a space. I do not wish to wrench myself by attempting to execute that celebrated pelvic gesture, by which the gentleman makes himself forcible, but I hope the House will consider that I have executed it as far as is necessary, and that I say with just as much distinctness as the gentleman employs that the result under the language he refers to will, in my belief, be just what I have stated. Let us see how this is.

A provision on this subject, substantially if not exactly like the present, was suggested originally in the Senate bill as first introduced. No one then denied or doubted that under it the officers of the existing Veteran Reserve corps were to be continued. The whole provision was struck out in the Senate committee. When the bill was under consideration in the Senate, an amendment was offered not in the same language here employed. The whole subject was sifted in debate, and before a vote was had the mover of the amendment adopted the original language which, as I said, was in effect if not literally the same as we have here, namely, "to be selected from officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, and appointed from other wounded officers." Still, nobody in the Senate doubted that the provision was for the especial benefit of the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps. So it was held and treated, and so it was condemned and defeated. So much to show that I am not solitary in my mistake, if mistake it be.

But let us look for ourselves at the probable result of such a provision. Who are the persons upon whom the provision is to act, and how are they now situated? The privates of the Veteran Reserve corps protested against being kept in service, and nearly all upon their own application have been discharged. Six hundred and twenty-one officers preferred not to be mustered out, and so remain in service. Three hundred of this number have already been provided for in the Freedmen's Bureau and in the Treasury service; the rest are unemployed. Look at these facts a moment, first, for another purpose. Here is a body of men conceded, for this purpose, to be all without exception meritorious, conceded to have suffered in the service of their country, and for three years they have been kept on light service and on full pay, while other men who have been wounded and disabled have been cast aside, or compelled, in spite of their wounds, to go to the front. All other heroes and martyrs have been doomed either to retire from pay after being disabled, or else, wounds or no wounds, to drag themselves back to the camp, the trench, and the battle-field.

Bear in mind, then, that these men as a body have been during three years drawing pay and performing the lightest duty of the service to the exclusion of all others; and bear in mind that there now remain as officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, say six hundred and twenty-one men, some detailed and some unemployed. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will not take me up upon the exactness of that statement. It may not be literally accurate. I will stop and refer to the figures if he does, as I have them somewhere on my desk.

Now, a Veteran Reserve corps of ten regiments is to be rendered permanent and to be officered by "selection"—mark the word—not by appointment afresh, but by "selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers who have been wounded in the line of their duty," &c. Does not everybody see what is likely to result from such a mode of organizing? All these officers are in already, they can act in concert, they and their friends can and will see to their interests and pilot them through red tape and other obstacles.

Being already imbedded in the corps, and having their places and commissions, they will be "selected," and although here and there other wounded officers may fight in or be in from the outside, the ready-made officers of this corps are to happen in, and outsiders are to have the right to shear the wolf; their trouble will be how to cut the fleece. Those who know the ins and outs of the matter can tell just how it can be worked; it has been explained to me by officers, and volunteers, too, who oppose the whole thing. But without going into the minutiae, we can all see about how it will be. So it is understood in the corps and out of the corps. How else shall we explain the influences around us?

Whence the enormous anxiety of the officers connected with this corps to have this provision retained if they are to come in only for a slight percentage of commissions? Because on the theory of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] when you come to put the three or four hundred officers of the Veteran Reserve corps who now remain out of employ in among all the wounded officers and soldiers of the country, they would be lost. They would be—

"Like the snow-flake in the river.
A moment white, then lost forever."

Every one must see that if this little few were to be mingled with the many, put on a par with all the wounded soldiers of the war, and only allowed to receive their share of commissions in proportion to their numbers, that share would be virtually nothing at all.

Is that the understanding of those who have besieged Congress on behalf of the Veteran Reserve corps? Is that the understanding of the volunteer officers who bear honorable and disabling scars who oppose and denounce the proposed legislation as unjust to them and their unnumbered comrades?

Circulars have been sent throughout the Veteran Reserve corps officers, as I understand, and as has never been denied, calling upon those addressed to contribute money in order to have their interests properly attended to before Congress. Has this expense and this equivocal expedient been resorted to for the benefit of somebody else?

No man can wink so hard as not to see that the practical operation of this bill as it stands is likely to be to substantially include all the officers of the existing Veteran Reserve corps, and only by accident to include anybody else. Therefore I say again, that while the bill does provide that the officers shall be taken not only from the present officers of the corps, but also appointed from among others who have been wounded in the late war, the effect will be as I believe in the first instance to secure in their places all those who are now in the corps.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has expired.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended.

No objection was made.

Mr. CONKLING. An insinuation has been made, I hope not by design, that those who oppose this measure oppose the defenders of the country, or are wanting in a sense of justice and gratitude to the defenders of the country.

The case is put as if here was an occasion to do an act of justice for the general good of those who went out from the fireside to the camp to maintain on far distant battle-fields the life and glory of their country. For one I deny this in toto. I repel the insinuation, and I can show that nothing could be a more heartless mockery than to pretend that the real sufferers by the war have any interest on earth in adding five regiments to the number of men required for the regular Army, for the purpose of organizing ten of them in the manner proposed.

In the first place, what is to become of the great bulk of those, a multitude sad to number, who have never been kept upon pay and in light service, but who went out and returned ruined by wounds and disease? How many of them will be unsuccessful for every one who succeeds in obtaining a commission in one of these ten regiments?

But again, are the most unfortunate to be included at all? An examination is required as to bodily ability. This will have the effect to cause the rejection of the most unfortunate of these men, to exclude those whose bodily disability is the greatest, and whose power to maintain themselves is the least. The advantage is to be enjoyed by those who are able in some sort to come up to the military standard. Therefore, as to the bestowal of the commissions, the plan is to favor the least needy.

How as to the men? Does any one suppose that regiments which are to do nothing but garrison duty need to be kept filled with men? Why, not at all. Does any one suppose they will be filled up and kept filled with men wounded heretofore? We know that it would be impossible to keep them filled by such wounded men even if it should be desirable. Why? Here is a regiment to be made up of five hundred wounded men. There are fifteen hundred other wounded men who would be glad to have places in the regiment, but they do not get there, and the occasion passes by. Does any one suppose that these fifteen hundred men are to stand as tide-waiters, watching for vacancies, that they will forego, or could or should forego, other modes of life so as to be ready to enlist?

"Each stepping where his comrade stood
The instant that he fell."

Then how, after the first formation of the regiments, is the body to be kept filled with men wounded "in the late war"? The first enlistment of privates might answer the description, but the recruiting must be done in other fields. One portion of wounded men are to be taken and the others are to be left to shift for themselves and to become occupied in various ways in life. The relief, then, is merely for those who in the first instance form these regiments.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to make a single suggestion. I think he cannot have understood the question which I put awhile ago to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Seeing that this suggestion might be made, I asked him what was the intention of the bill in this respect, and whether he had any objection to an amendment striking out the words "by selection from among officers of the present Reserve corps." He assured me that he would not object to it. This does away with that part of the argument of the gentleman from New York. I do not know whether the gentleman heard the remark.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not overlook it, and I am very glad that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made this suggestion. For one, I shall vote for that amendment when I have the opportunity. And I am glad to have the gentleman's attention at this moment, because I want it directed to the fact that even if those words were stricken out, the fault of the bill will not be cured in the particular he suggests. It will still be open to evasion and easy abuse. How are the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps to be gotten out to take their chance fairly with other men? That is the question. The Veteran Reserve corps exists; and you propose to prolong and perpetuate it. Now, unless you have some provision which dissolves this organization, which turns these officers out, which makes the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps as well as the others applicants in the same sense and on the same footing for appointment, the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be accomplished, although the bill will be improved.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he understands that if this bill passes, these officers are necessarily retained? May they not be mustered out by the Department in the same way as other officers are?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I do understand precisely that, and so I think will the gentleman from Pennsylvania when I remind him how all this has been managed. When we came here this session the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps were in the position in which the gentleman assumes they are now. They had been brought into being by an order; and they could be sent out by an order. But in the early part of the session, upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, a resolution was adopted calling upon the War Department not to muster out these officers, as the Department was doing, until provision to that effect had been made by Congress. That was the substance of it. Now, I challenge any gentleman to show me in this bill any provision overriding that declaration of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the gentleman really want an answer?

Mr. CONKLING. My friend's manner is rather appalling; but if there is no danger at this distance—

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask my friend from New York whether the resolution to which he refers was a joint resolution, or merely an expression of the opinion of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not sure whether it was a joint resolution or not, and therefore I have refrained from saying anything of it except that it passed the House. I know that such a resolution passed this House; and I remember very well that I inquired at the time whether it was to lead to such a result as it is like to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that was a mere resolution of the House, making a request of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CONKLING. And here, in the return made from the Adjutant General's office, with which my colleague [Mr. VAN AERNAM] supplies me, there is a note in the case of a number of officers, stating that they are retained under the resolution of Congress to await further action in their cases. Three hundred and ninety-nine are retained in that way.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman really wants information on this point—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK?]

Mr. CONKLING. I will if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I decline to yield. I have had a great deal of curiosity on this point; and I have asked at the Department and outside of the Department, what was to be the effect of such a provision as this; and I am advised that by the bill as it now stands the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps will be transferred in a body to the corps provided for by this bill. I fear that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will not insure the contrary, and if the section is retained I shall move a further amendment in the same direction.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York that it would be more satisfactory if he would point out the section of the bill which conveys that meaning, instead of indulging in loose and vague assertions with nothing in the bill to support them.

Mr. CONKLING. I have endeavored to refer to the provisions of the bill; and I will suggest to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] that possibly by listening he will have his attention directed to some provisions of the bill which he may not understand any better than the rest of us.

I take up this matter, Mr. Speaker, in a plain way, and judge with the poor light I have, and also from what gentlemen say who know more about such things than I do. Taking the words as they stand, and even as proposed to be modified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] unless he turns out the Veteran Reserve corps, and have them begin again, the preference will be given to this set of officers over the others, as I think.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me read. It provides for ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps. Does not that show de novo operation?

Mr. CONKLING. The bill says, also, that the Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by officers selected from the present Veteran Reserve corps. Does this treat the language of the other section which the gentleman reads as requiring everything de novo?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman refers to another section: They are not to be transferred as they now are, but new regiments are to be raised, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. CONKLING. I have succeeded partly in my purpose by rousing the attention of the House, although I have wandered from saying the most that I wished to.

In the fragment of time left to me I will make another remark. I submit to the chairman of the Military Committee that he states rather strongly when his auditors are people not accustomed to military distinctions the proposition that officers can never enter the Army if they have been wounded. He does not mean that. He does not mean, I think, to say that officers are so examined as to be rejected merely because they do not come up to the bodily standard required in the case of privates.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do, most certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the gentleman say an officer in the service goes out as a private goes out, in consequence of being wounded?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman asks whether an officer is subject to medical examination on his appointment, and I say he is. One of the best officers of the Veteran Reserve corps was a candidate for the place of second lieutenant in the regular Army and was rejected on medical inspection.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no doubt an officer may be so disabled as to be unable to do duty in the Army and may be rejected for that reason. I have no doubt there are such cases. Phil. Kearney, though, went one-armed, with his bridle in his teeth, through all the war till he fell in fight, and nobody but death mustered him out. Officers who are fit to do duty are not, as I understand the application of the law, rejected because they have been wounded at some time and could not pass examination as privates.

It seems to me the true way to provide for officers and men wounded in the war is to adopt measures which will deal equitably and impartially among them all. This cannot be done by mixing one bill with another, and ingrafting upon a bill to make the Army more efficient an invalid corps, holding out benefits to them which ought to be given in another way. No man can invent a stronger measure for the relief of our soldiers and their families of a proper and fair character than I will vote for. The more it favors wounded and disabled men the heartier shall be my support. This provision does nothing wise or just in that direction, and therefore it wins no favor with me on that account.

Mr. PAINE obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BLAINE, who said: Mr. Speaker, I want the floor for five minutes to correct a gross misapprehension, I will not call it a misrepresentation, of the gentleman from New York. When the gentleman from New York speaks of his own knowledge on a subject he is a gentleman of accuracy to whom I always listen with great pleasure. He is not so accurate when he speaks upon the suggestions of others who are interested adversely to this bill.

He makes the broad assertion that this bill incorporates the Veteran Reserve corps as it stands into the regular Army. He has evidently not read the bill. The fourth section of the bill says:

Of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps.

The fifth section:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

Now, if the gentleman from New York will turn to the thirty-fifth section of the bill, he will find that no person shall be appointed to office in the line or staff corps of the Army until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board to be convened under the direction of the Secretary of War, so that as a matter of fact, I assert it in its broadest and most unexceptionable sense, officers of the Veteran Reserve corps now in commission are not given one single inch advantage over any other wounded officers along the length and breadth of the loyal States. And the gentleman from New York certainly made a loose and vague assertion on that subject, contrary to the very letter and spirit, line and precept of the bill. I say this in vindication of the committee, of whom he has spoken as having cunningly gotten this in. It is drawn with very great care and proper safeguards are thrown around it.

Mr. PAINE. I am in favor of this provision of the bill which constitutes the Veteran Reserve corps. I am at the same time in favor of making careful provision for wounded officers and soldiers both of the volunteer and regular Army who have not hitherto been in that corps. If I supposed for one moment that the result of the provision contained in this section would be to give preference to men who are already in the Veteran Reserve corps, at the expense of those wounded officers and men who have never yet been placed in that corps, I should be opposed to the provision and struggle for its amendment.

And I am pleased to see the anxiety manifested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in favor of these wounded officers and soldiers who have not hitherto been members of that corps. I only wish it had gone a little further, and had promised to take some practical form in this House which might benefit them. I only wish he had manifested a willingness so to amend this bill as to give these wounded officers and soldiers of the volunteer and of the regular Army, who have not hitherto been provided for in the Veteran corps, a chance under this law. But no; he turns with scorn from every attempt to amend this bill so as to include them, and makes that provision the basis of his opposition, and then turns around and positively refuses to do anything by way of amendment which shall obviate that objection. Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] does obviate that objection.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the gentleman say I refused to have anything to do with that amendment?

Mr. PAINE. I do not say that he refuses to vote for that amendment, but I do understand him—and if I am mistaken I beg he will correct me—to have intimated to the House that notwithstanding that amendment he will vote against this Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend I know will indulge me in saying that he did misapprehend me. What I said was, that I should vote with pleasure for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and should seek to amend the section still further, if it was not stricken out, so as to accomplish the object which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] now announces.

Mr. PAINE. I am happy then to understand the gentleman as being willing to vote for the Veteran Reserve corps if the provision shall be so framed as to meet his views.

Mr. CONKLING. If we are going to have any, I will.

Mr. PAINE. Allow me to read this provision for the Veteran Reserve corps, as it will stand amended by the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers or regular troops who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that that provision is fair to all the wounded officers and soldiers of the volunteer and of the regular Army; that it embraces them all, and that under this provision it will be the duty of the Secretary of War and of the President—a duty which they cannot evade honestly or fairly in reorganizing this corps—to select out of the whole body of the officers and soldiers wounded or diseased those who are best fitted to fill these regiments. Now, I ask what objection there can be to that.

I will not detain this House now by discussing all the arguments of the gentleman as to whether or not this Veteran Reserve corps should be established. I believe it is absolutely certain that not only in peace but in war we must employ a force equal to that embraced in these regiments for the performance of just exactly the duties which these men and these officers will be fully able to perform. And it is absolutely necessary that we should retain them in regimental organizations, and not have them in detachments or in squads. Then, I ask, what objections, upon principles of equity and humanity and justice, can there be if we undertake at once to provide for this case, and to discharge a duty of solemn obligation to the gallant men who have gone through this war, and suffered in the defense of their country, and for the maintenance of the national existence?

I shall vote to amend, improve, and perfect this provision, and after that is done I shall vote to retain it as a principal feature of this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I have been greatly impressed by the remarks which have been made by the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] as well as the remarks of other honorable gentlemen who have sustained this provision of the bill, in regard to the bravery and valor of the men who are to be provided for by this section.

But I have not yet forgotten that we have an interest at stake in which thirty million people are interested, far greater and above the mere interest which may be contemplated by this bill for the benefit and advancement of those who have been wounded in the late war. Now, I am as willing as any man in this House to accord to the brave and gallant soldiers every effort to reward them for the duties which they have performed upon the field of battle, which may be within the legitimate sphere of our action. But while I am willing to accord to them all that we owe to them, I still remember that we have a great country at stake, and that we are here to-day deliberating for the purpose of establishing an army for the whole country, to represent thirty million people, an army that some day may be marshaled against the combined forces and hordes of Europe, that may attempt to trample upon our rights.

But the interests of this particular class of men, the particular claims that they have upon the community, must give way to the interests of the people at large. We must not allow our feelings and prejudices in favor of these men to so warp our judgments as to lead us to legislate against the best interests of the country, merely because these men have exhibited bravery and valor upon the field of battle and have been wounded.

Sir, as much bravery, as much valor, as much patriotism as were ever exhibited upon the field of battle in any country, whether upon this continent or upon any other, have been exhibited during the late war by men who were not wounded at all. And because men in the discharge of their duty may have received wounds that is no particular evidence of their bravery over those whose bravery undaunted defied the bullets that have whirled around them, whose bravery in battle was evinced in the most determined manner, and yet who had the good fortune to escape any wounds whatever.

Now, those persons who have been fortunate enough to obtain positions in this Veteran Reserve corps took them with the distinct understanding—at least I so understood it, and I think almost every one so understood it—that that Veteran Reserve organization was merely for a temporary purpose; and because they have had the benefits of those places for two or three years of bloody warfare, without being exposed to the dangers to which other soldiers have been exposed, that is no reason why we should pass this class legislation in their favor, when they embrace not more than one out of twenty of the wounded soldiers of the Union Army.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the gentleman know that the text of the bill does not confine it to this Veteran Reserve corps?

Mr. ROGERS. That is the meaning of the bill and the only construction which can be put upon it. If the intention is not to give an advantage to the Veteran Reserve corps why say that the officers shall be taken from their ranks? Why is it that the body of the Reserve corps to be established by virtue of this bill shall be taken from the body of the Reserve corps as it exists at this time? Now, I say that this bill will authorize the officers of the Reserve corps as it now exists to take the places in these ten regiments, while that other body of wounded men, twenty times as large, who have been so unfortunate as not to get into the Veteran Reserve corps, are entirely excluded from the benefits of the Reserve corps to be established by this bill.

For one I am unwilling to make this discrimination between those who have not had the benefit of the Reserve or Invalid corps and those who have had it. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the present Reserve corps, or the highest maximum number of it at any time during the war, would not constitute more than one twentieth of the wounded soldiers of the Union Army. Why should we make this class legislation here? These persons have been protected and taken care of by the Federal Government during three years of war merely because they happened to have the good fortune to get in this Reserve corps, while twenty times as many men who were not so fortunate and who were exposed to the same risks of battle are not provided for by this bill.

But I am mainly opposed to this bill for a graver and greater consideration, and that is for the interests of the country. I am not willing to do anything here for the benefit of these men that will destroy the morale of the American Army and impair its efficiency. No instance can be pointed out in the history of the world, from the time of Alexander the Great down to the present time, where, in the organization of a great army, an invalid corps has been provided for in the very commencement.

Sir, I say that all history will be false if it be true that it is to the best interest of any country, at the formation of an army, to incorporate into that army a body of men who are recognized before they enter the army as unfit to do the great work of military duty for the protection of the country when an invasion may come upon it or an insurrection may break out in it.

Now, I am in favor of paying these men liberally in the way in which the Government has always provided for its soldiers in such cases. It is enough to put them on an equality with the other soldiers and officers of the Army, with the other brave men who have shown determination and valor equally with them, without making this particular class legislation, and without specifying and picking out these individuals as the ones who are to have particular consideration from the Government, by placing them in this Reserve corps and making it a part of the permanent organization of the American Army.

As was remarked by the learned and eloquent gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] cases will arise fast enough by accidents and sickness and wounds received in the service to constitute a corps of this kind in the Army, without providing for such a corps at the outset. You cannot point to the legislation of any country in the world where heretofore provision has been made in the formation of an army, that ten, twenty, or any other number of regiments should be composed and constituted of men unable to do the most important military duty.

Why, sir, I have understood from military men, in conversation with them, that they want able-bodied men in the Army, men able and ready at any time when invasion may come upon the country on a sudden, when we have not time to prepare for war, before volunteers can be called out—that they may have able-bodied and efficient men to advance to the protection of the country at once, and that is the object and intent of the formation of a regular army in this country.

When our Constitution provided that Congress should have power to raise and maintain an army, it had reference only to the raising and maintaining of a regular army; and it is a fact which the history of all countries in all times attests that a standing army, which is to be called upon in emergencies for the defense of the country, should be composed of able-bodied men, competent to render effective service.

But, sir, it is enough for me to know that General Grant, General Sherman, General Meade, and General Thomas have all given the weight of their opinion against the formation of any such corps as this. Sir, I have confidence in the patriotism and the sagacious judgment of these officers. I do not pretend to be a military man; I have never been in the Army; but as one of the Representatives of the people of this great country, I am ready to accept the views of those who are better qualified than I am to determine what is best calculated to promote the efficient organization of the Army of the United States. I am satisfied that the advice given by such men as these is prompted by the purest motives and the highest wisdom; and I am willing to be guided by that advice.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. I have only three minutes of my time remaining, and I cannot yield.

Besides, sir, this very question has been under consideration in the Senate of the United States. The Army bill as first presented there contained a section similar to this. But the committee of the Senate, to whom that bill was referred, struck out the whole section with regard to the Veteran Reserve corps; and subsequently two thirds of the Senate voted against inserting in the bill any such provision as that contained in the bill reported by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am satisfied that the members of the Senate, in taking this action, were actuated by considerations of duty and a regard to the best interests of the country, guided by the knowledge which they had derived from leading military men.

However much regard, therefore, I may have for the members of this corps on account of the bravery which they have shown, I am not willing, with all the light we have on this question, to jeopard the interests of the country for one instant for the sake of advancing the welfare of any one class of people in this country.

Sir, these men ought to be provided for, and the Government is able to take care of them; and I am for inaugurating measures that will break down this Freedmen's Bureau system, this refugee system, and this provost marshal system, seeking at every man's heels for his blood; and I am ready to vote for spending the money of the Government in caring for the soldiers. But do not let us undertake, in this indirect way, regardless of the interests of the country, to provide for these men. Let us be liberal in appropriations of money for their support, but when we are organizing an army for the defense of the country, let us seek to insure the efficiency of that army.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a certain kind of class legislation. I am in favor of legislation for the benefit of that class of persons who are the survivors of those that have lost their lives in the defense of the country. I am in favor, also, of legislation for the benefit of those who have suffered wounds or incurred disability in the service of their country. I am in favor of such class legislation. And, Mr. Speaker, my objection to the provision of this bill with reference to the Veteran Reserve corps is that it should, in my judgment, be extended so as to include more of these men who have been wounded or partially disabled in the service, provided they are able to discharge the duties required of them.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will observe that all the gentlemen who oppose this Veteran Reserve corps, however much sympathy they may profess for the officers and soldiers who have rendered faithful service, finally settle down in their remarks to the point made by the gentleman from New Jersey that they are opposed to any of the wounded men being in the Army. Because General Grant has expressed the opinion that able-bodied officers should be placed on duty in the far West and in the South, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] attempting to support himself by that opinion, argues in favor of giving all the easy places to the able-bodied officers of the regular Army, while I contend that the easy positions should be given to the wounded and disabled soldiers who have so nobly fought for their country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the only question that is here for discussion is whether a wounded officer or soldier shall have the "soft places" in the Army, the duties of which they can discharge as well as the most able-bodied officers and soldiers.

It has been suggested that these men should retire from the Army upon their pensions. Now, sir, I do not want them to be put in the position of pensioners taking money from the Government when doing nothing, while they can discharge the duties of very many places where we now have able-bodied officers. Men in the Veteran Reserve corps if discharged would only get eight dollars pension whereas they now have full pay and are on duty; and the officers, numbering some three hundred and more, who now get full pay, would only get pensions from seventeen to thirty dollars.

The gentleman wants to know how we are to get rid of them. Let them be distributed to the States and Territories according to the number of troops raised. Of the three hundred officers of the Veteran Reserve corps one hundred and twenty-nine came from the State of New York. Under the distribution suggested, her share would be thirty-two. The others we can easily fill up from the western States.

And it must be recollected that one of the objections to the Veteran Reserve corps is that it was not distributed fairly, and not because members are opposed to providing for wounded officers and men. The bill corrects that. It provides there shall be a fair distribution of wounded men in this corps and not to turn them all out.

For my own part I am in favor of providing this for these wounded officers and men. I hold in my hand a letter from a wounded soldier of my own regiment, asking and praying for this as a boon. I will read it:

"General, you know I have served my country as a faithful soldier, from the beginning of the war until the ending, and all I ask of it is merely to give me a situation in the Army as a soldier. You know your regiment was through many a hard-fought battle, that I never was absent from one except when wounded. I now bear the scars of thirteen wounds, and I want a place as a soldier if I can get it."

Mr. Speaker, it is for the wounded soldiers as well as the wounded officers I want a Veteran Reserve corps. It is because we have wounded officers and soldiers that a Veteran Reserve corps is necessary.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to call the previous question on this section after making a remark or two in behalf of the committee.

I am determined we shall not be misunderstood. I am determined to correct a misrepresentation which has been insisted on although again and again corrected. I do it by saying this: the Committee on Military Affairs had no idea of framing any bill providing for this Veteran Reserve corps except by making appointments to it from the wounded officers from all arms of the service, at least so far as volunteers are concerned. More than that, I am willing it should be extended to include the regular Army.

I will give notice to this House that no opposition will be made, but on the contrary my entire approval given to an amendment such as is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Wisconsin—in the fifth section, that the language shall be altered so as to read that the Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered from any officers and soldiers of the volunteers and of the regular Army who have been wounded during the late war. I am determined there shall be no misapprehension about this, so that when gentlemen vote to strike out the provision for the Veteran Reserve corps I want it to be understood they are voting to strike it out with the distinct understanding that the officers are to be selected from all arms of the service, officers and privates.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will go a little further, and provide for the apportioning of the appointments to be made among the several States. It is said the appointments shall be made to the effect that the public interest shall be subserved. The Veteran Reserve corps being in the service now they would of course be selected according to these dictates of public interest. If it be provided that these officers shall be apportioned among the several States as nearly as possible, I will, for one, vote for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that. There is virtually a provision "as nearly as the public service will warrant."

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. There is the point.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman may move an amendment when we come to that section. We thought when we provided that these appointments should be made proportionately among the States we were doing about as well as we could. We could not cut a man in two.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in relation to the reorganization of the Army. I would like to know what was the proportion of the regular Army officers who served in the war compared with the volunteer officers belonging not only to the Veteran Reserve corps but to other branches of the Army, who distinguished themselves and showed themselves equally efficient upon the field and in discipline. And I would suggest whether it would not be fair to give to all such officers a fair chance.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is so much a matter of history that I shall not undertake to answer it. I will only say that we shall have to depend upon the statistics furnished at the other end of the avenue, and I do not know but each man had better make up his own table as to the comparative merits of volunteers and regulars. I move the previous question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have an amendment that I wish to offer before this section is disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will withdraw my demand for the previous question so as to allow it to be read.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to state that by a bill which passed this House a few days since, the law on the statute-book depriving pensioners of their pension during the time they were employed by the Government was changed. Now, if this bill should pass and this Veteran Reserve corps should be constituted, the officers and soldiers in that corps would receive their pensions. Therefore I propose to insert in line eight, after the word "corps," as follows:

And pensions of all officers appointed to the Veteran Reserve corps, to privates enlisted in said corps, to cease from their appointment or enlistment.

Mr. SCHENCK. That does not properly belong here. I would rather not see it inserted in this bill. It is the law now. I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. DAVIS to strike out of section four the following:

Of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 84, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Conkling, Davis, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jenckes, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McRuer, Nicholson, Phelps, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Taber, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, and James F. Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, Asabel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Merout, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Stilwell, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Bergen, Blow, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Cobb, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Parquhar, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelso, Kerr, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Moulton, Noell, Pike, Plants, Pomerooy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Strouse, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. Davis's amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The fifth section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the thirty-seven regiments of infantry, first provided for in the foregoing section, shall consist of those now commissioned and serving therewith, subject to such examination as the condition of their being retained in the service as is hereinafter provided for; all the original vacancies in the grades of first and second lieutenant, and two thirds of all other original vacancies in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, to be filled by selection from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of rebellion, and who have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service; but graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants. The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps and by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned. The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among the present officers of colored troops who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war. And all appointments of officers in the Veteran Reserve corps and in regiments of colored troops shall be made on examination, as hereinafter provided, having reference to capacity, good conduct, and efficient service in every case.

Mr. PAINE. In order to make that section conform to section three, as amended, I move to strike out the following:

All the original vacancies in the grades of first lieutenant and second lieutenant, and two thirds of all other original vacancies in each of the grades above that of first lieutenant, to be filled by selection from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of rebellion, and who have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service; but graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the thirty-seven regiments thus provided for, and for a period of three years after the passage of this act, all first and second lieutenants and two thirds of the officers of each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service; but graduates of the United States Military Academy and enlisted men shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in those regiments, as in the new regiments of cavalry, under the provisions of the third section of this act, and not otherwise.

Mr. SCHENCK. That amendment only makes the section conform to what the House has determined in regard to the other section. I have no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I understand the amendment, as read, it provides that graduates of the United States Military Academy and enlisted men shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants. I want to know if that does not leave it open so that any man, whether he has ever served or not, can go and enlist one day and the next day be commissioned under this provision. I simply make the inquiry.

Mr. PAINE. The amendment is carefully guarded on that point, and prescribes precisely the same conditions and requirements as are prescribed in regard to the six new cavalry regiments in the third section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am satisfied. I see that it is so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. In pursuance of the notice I gave, I now move to strike out the words "by selection from the officers of the present Veteran Reserve corps, and," and to insert after the word "volunteers" the words "or of the regular Army;" so that the clause will read:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers or of the regular Army who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to move to amend the amendment so as to provide that the present officers of the Veteran Reserve corps shall be mustered out and put upon a par with other wounded officers, so that they may all take their chance together.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand this amendment to allow any soldier who has been wounded in the United States service to be promoted to be an officer of the Veteran Reserve corps.

I understand the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] in this amendment, to have adopted the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] And from the point of view in which I look at it I recognize in it a step in the right direction. I suppose it is the effort of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to include the colored troops and permit them to be made officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, and that is proper, that is just, that is consistent with the teachings of the modern "Moses." [Laughter.] And if gentlemen will only go on in that direction they will reorganize the American Army on a basis that will make it irresistible. They can "carry the war into Africa." They can overcome all sections and all sexes. I hope it was in that spirit that the gentleman from Pennsylvania made that suggestion. [Cries of "Louder!" "Louder!"] Sir, I consider the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania loud enough. It speaks in trumpet tones of the philanthropy and patriotism of that gentleman.

Sir, I do not think the gentleman from Ohio has looked into this question as deeply as he should have done. I think he has allowed himself to be duped by the astute mind of the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and if he is not careful he will find a bill introduced here making a specific appropriation for this very class of officers; for officers taken from among the colored troops of the line who have been wounded in the service of their country. For it must be borne in mind that the appropriations which have been made for the Army as now organized will not be sufficient for what is here proposed.

This is a new movement; one in the right direction, but still a new movement. The gentleman from Ohio is being led in a direction he knows not whither. If the American armies shall be organized as is proposed, if the colored troops are to be brought into the organization, as is proposed by him and by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, he must consider the effect upon the existing organization of the Army. Accepting the proposition that has been laid down here by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the black man is superior to the white man, then we must provide means for retiring our white officers. It is not possible that the competition can exist with safety to the white officers.

We have been told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that the battles of this country have been won by the colored troops, led by white officers, to be sure. But suppose those troops are to be led by black officers, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, where are your white officers to go? I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that he shall look well into these questions. He is amending this bill in a manner which will defeat it. There are gentlemen on the other side of the House who cannot stand this thing; there are gentlemen who are not ready to officer the United States armies with colored officers.

We have refused, through our committees, upon a direct application to this House by petition, to appoint colored soldiers as officers; but by this act of indirection, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Committee on Military Affairs are being duped into following a course which they themselves have already refused to take, and they will stand stultified upon the record of the House.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] suggests that this is a movement toward the tropics; that it is an effort on the part of the sagacious chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to move toward Mexico and the tropics; to take possession of those countries where the white man wilts and turns yellow, and where nothing blooms but the cactus and the negro.

Sir, this insidious effort on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to destroy the American Army is in keeping with his successful effort to force the civil rights bill upon this House, to reduce the dignity of American citizenship, overriding the veto of the President, and placing the ipse dixit of a peculiar clique upon the laws of the country.

I hope, before it is too late, before the Military Committee is utterly committed to this folly by its too great trustfulness in the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this matter will be so ventilated and placed before the country that all may know whether or not the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is aware of his position, whether or not he really means that the wounded and disabled colored soldier shall be made an officer of the Army of the United States. Let that gentleman come forward and avow whether or not he is in earnest upon that subject, or whether he is innocently allowing himself to be misled by the great philanthropist of the country, the venerable statesman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONKLING. I will read the amendment I desire to offer, and the Chair will be kind enough to indicate the proper place in this section for it to come in. It is as follows:

Provided, That the officers of the existing Veteran Reserve corps shall, upon the passage of this act, be mustered out of service, and be put upon the same footing with other disabled officers.

The SPEAKER. That amendment can be offered to come in at the end of the section by way of addition to the section, but will not be in order for action until other amendments to perfect the section have been disposed of.

Mr. CONKLING. I will give notice that at the proper time I will offer the amendment I have read.

The SPEAKER. By general consent of the House, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] can be received at this time, to be voted upon when all the amendments for the purpose of perfecting this section shall have been disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the fifth section by striking out in the twenty-fifth line the words "the present," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "those who have served as," and by striking out in the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth lines the words "who have served;" so that the clause will read:

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war.

The language as it stands at present assumes that all the officers of colored troops are yet in the service; while in fact a great many have been mustered out even since this bill was framed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "war," in the twenty-seventh line, the following words:

But graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in those regiments as in the new regiments of cavalry under the provisions of the third section of this act.

So that the clause will read as follows: *

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war. But graduates of the United States Military Academy shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in these regiments, as in the new regiments of cavalry, under the provisions of the third section of this act.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Why not make officers of other volunteer troops eligible to these appointments? The section, if amended as proposed, would confine appointments as officers of these colored troops to those who have been officers of colored troops and to cadets who shall hereafter graduate. There is no propriety in that.

Mr. MARSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was adopted.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered, and will be reserved till the question is taken on the pending amendment.

Mr. PAINE. My object in offering this amendment was simply to give to the graduates of West Point, under the precise conditions which we have imposed upon them in the cases of the six new regiments of cavalry and the thirty-seven regiments of regular infantry, an opportunity to become competitors for second lieutenantcies in the colored troops. I see no reason why the graduates of West Point should be excluded in this case from the privilege which they have in the other two cases.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment, if he will make it a little broader. I do not see why we should extend the section so as to include graduates of the Military Academy unless we also extend the privilege to officers and soldiers of volunteers. If the amendment be made as broad as the provision with reference to the six regiments of cavalry I shall have no objection.

Mr. MARSTON. It was to accomplish that very object that I moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was adopted. I desire that appointments to the command of colored troops shall be thrown open, not only to those who have served with colored troops, but also to all the officers of volunteers.

Mr. PAINE. I do not say that I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] or the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. MARSTON;] but it seems to me that it is hardly fair to load down my amendment in that way.

It undoubtedly occurred to the committee, in framing this clause of the bill, that some consideration was due to those officers of the Army who had encountered during this war the prejudices which at first unhappily prevailed against service in the colored troops. I am ready to recognize the claims of those men who were willing to stand up in the face of that prejudice and serve as officers of colored troops. If, however, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted, we may perhaps fail to obtain a proper recognition of the desert of those officers who have heretofore served with colored troops. I am in favor of giving to the officers who have gallantly served with the colored troops hitherto the first opportunity in the officering of these colored regiments. But after this privilege shall have been extended to them, I certainly am in favor of giving to the graduates of West Point an opportunity to become second lieutenants of these troops. I shall probably vote for the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois; but I would rather vote for it as an independent proposition, and not as a load upon the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe I cannot vote for the amendment or the suggestion. If I read this rightly, after the first vacancy the subsequent vacancies become open for all troops. I do not know how many regiments of colored troops there were. I am told there were nearly two hundred. We have only eight regiments provided for here. I think it is best to leave it as it is. It only gives to those who served in the colored troops the vacancies in these eight regiments. I think it fair to leave as this does, all future vacancies to the discretion of the appointing power.

Mr. PAINE. As there seems to be some opposition to this I withdraw it.

The question recurred on Mr. MARSTON'S motion to reconsider.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have an amendment which I think will cover the ground. I move to strike out these words, in the twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh lines:

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among the present officers of colored troops who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The officers of colored troops herein provided for shall be selected and appointed in the same manner provided herein for officering the six regiments of cavalry provided for in the third section of this act.

I think that will cover all that the gentleman from New Hampshire seeks, and I hope, therefore, he will withdraw his motion to reconsider so that I may move my amendment.

Mr. MARSTON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now move the amendment. I am not particularly wedded to this method of officering the colored troops. It brings up the question to be determined by the House. It places the colored troops upon the same footing that you place the cavalry and infantry, and on the same footing as the Veteran Reserve corps. I do not see why the door should not be open to all officers and soldiers who served in the Army for commissions in the colored troops as in the cavalry.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and will give in a word my reasons. As it has been already stated, there were nearly two hundred regiments of colored troops for whom the officers were selected from the Army, and examined before being appointed. I doubt whether we had anywhere during the war so carefully a selected body of men as those who commanded the colored troops.

I will remind the House that it required no little moral courage to take position in the colored regiments when they were first raised. I remember well when I drew an order calling a board which organized the first regiment of colored troops. I know that many officers said, "You cannot find enough respectable officers in this Army to officer that regiment." When a prominent staff officer accepted the position, and was made colonel of the regiment, and the ice was broken, we were enabled ultimately to get it raised. For a long time men were compelled to bear reproaches as commanders of negroes. Those who bore the prejudice, and who bore the taunts, and who showed themselves to be able officers, it is no more than right, I think, should fill these vacancies. When the original vacancies are filled they will be then thrown open to all. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CHANLER. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

The act or part of any act which authorized the use of colored troops in the Army of the United States is hereby repealed.

All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this section of an act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield a few minutes of his time so that I may reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHANLER. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois. Then I propose to speak to my own amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to reply to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He says that it required a considerable degree of moral courage at one time for a man to take command of colored troops. Now, I recollect very well that at the very first organization of the colored troops there were men enough in the Army of the United States who had the moral courage to apply for positions in colored regiments, many more than were required to fill the regiments. There was no time when there were not at the office of Colonel Foster in this city pigeon holes full of applications for positions as officers of colored troops. Now, sir, why not open the door to these men who had just as much moral courage at the time as those who succeeded in getting the commissions?

Mr. STEVENS. I remember in this House, when it was proposed to raise colored troops, that many declared that nobody could be found to command them; and certainly a member from Illinois declared that all the highest officers would resign if you put them in the field.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Who was that?

A MEMBER. General Logan.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know whether that general made that remark or not. I think I have heard him deny ever having made it. But certain it is, and I presume every member of this House who was a member of Congress at that time can bear witness to the fact, that there were applications upon applications of soldiers in the field for the privilege of being examined before this board and for appointments in the colored regiments, a great many more than could be appointed.

Now, hundreds of these soldiers thus applying were obliged to serve in the war in the ranks because there were not colored troops enough to admit them to these places. Why should we not, then, open the door for these men? Why should we confine the officering of this colored corps to those that have served with them? Open the door. I have no doubt that all these worthy officers who desire to come in and who have served well with the colored regiments will stand a better chance for appointment than new men. Undoubtedly they will. But do not let us confine it to any particular class of men. Open the door broadly for competition to every man who deems himself worthy to seek the place.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in offering the amendment to the amendment is to place myself right upon the record, after having endeavored in vain to induce the gentlemen on the other side to officer the colored troops with colored men. There is nothing so utterly inconsistent in legislation as the effort of gentlemen on the other side to induce a class of our fellow-citizens to do the fighting and then not give them the same reward they claim for their own laborers in the field. There has never been any greater incentive offered to a soldier than that of rising gradually from the humblest to the highest rank. And when gentlemen who have served in the field, after having reiterated upon this floor time and again how great are their obligations to the soldiers, bring in here propositions to exclude the black man from any chance of becoming an officer in the Army, I deem it fit and proper at this time to bring in an amendment whereby the whole organization shall be repealed. It is a blot on the military organization of America, a blot on the whole early policy and system of this Government. You say that Democracy at the origin of the Government claimed that all men were equal. If the negro is your equal at home, is he not so on the battle-field? And if you deny him the right to march with the sword at his side as well as with the musket on his shoulder, you should, to be consistent, take from him both. He should not be allowed to use either as an implement of war unless he is allowed to use both. There is no variation or shadow of turning from the line of right and justice in this matter.

I know that in their inner hearts the gentlemen on the other side do not wish to officer the Army with negroes. I know that this is the last grand act of the apocalypse of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] But let him begin at the root by recognizing the equality of the negro in arms as well as elsewhere.

After riding over the President's veto of the civil rights bill, are you willing to take the position that, as regards the military service, you have disenfranchised this people? The slander is false and unjust. Such conduct as that is political heresy and against your own doctrine. I say that the Republican party is to-day guilty of political heresy in not officering the black troops with black officers. I know that it has been ruled out of order to use such language here, but I also know that in the face of the facts you dare not deny that what I say is true. My friend on the left [Mr. BALDWIN] says that is sound doctrine. He, too, is waiting an opportunity, under the modern Moses, to pass over the Jordan—

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. CHANLER. Oh, certainly. The gentleman is always so very courteous. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. I want merely to thank the gentleman for having given the House and the country the information that Moses did cross the Jordan. [Laughter.] We had thought before that he never got over.

Mr. CHANLER. I thank brother Aaron for his suggestion. I do not see the originality of his idea, and I can hardly see the force of his remark.

I ask the House to come to a vote upon this proposition. I want to see how many men there are here who are sincere, how many men who, having cried up the colored soldiers, are unwilling to give them the rank of officers in the Army of the United States. I ask the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thought it a good time for the previous question to be demanded after the gentleman had made a speech, and I rose for that purpose.

Mr. CHANLER. I had no desire to cut off debate upon this proposition. I did not mean to demand the previous question, but I ask the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the previous question will not be called before I have an opportunity to offer my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman's amendment is already pending, and I move the previous question.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that. I will renew it. I want to say a word or two upon my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw it. The yeas and nays were ordered upon Mr. CHANLER'S amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the situation of the question now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] moved a proviso to be added to this section, which was reserved by general consent until the section should be perfected. There is now pending an amendment to that amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. After that question has been taken, then, I will make the suggestions which I desire to present to the House.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the evening session been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, then, that until further orders, the evening sessions be dispensed with.

Mr. BLAINE. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It is within the power of a majority of the House to do it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, let us do it.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will confine his motion to this week.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will agree to that modification.

Mr. BLAINE. Has the gentleman from Illinois a right to make the motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; it is a privileged motion, pertaining to the order of business in the House, and can be entertained even pending a demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion so as to make it general. We can order evening sessions whenever we want them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House how the matter now stands. The House under a suspension of the rules directed the holding of an evening session each day except Saturdays "until otherwise ordered." The words "until otherwise ordered" place it in the power of the majority of the House to order otherwise at any time. And they can order that there shall be no evening session for any particular day, or they can order that the evening sessions be dispensed with until otherwise ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Can the majority of the House order an evening session at any time, if the motion of my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] prevails?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, at any time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am myself in favor of suspending indefinitely the order for evening sessions.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move to amend it so that the suspension shall be indefinite, to the end that we may not be required to be on the watch to ascertain if we are to come here at an evening session.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the amendment will not prevail. It may be necessary—

Mr. CONKLING. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I think this proposition should not be debated either way.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. CONKLING to the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.

Upon a division there were—ayes 72, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 261) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner;

An act (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson; and

An act (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Emerance Gouler.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to reorganize the Army.

The pending question was upon the amendment of Mr. CHANLER to the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH to the fifth section.

Mr. CONKLING. I stated a few moments ago that I would make a brief statement in reference to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] offered an amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH], and that the previous question has been ordered on those amendments?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been called; but the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then why should the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] discuss another amendment which he proposes to offer presently, when he can discuss it just as well after we have disposed of those now pending?

The SPEAKER. By general consent the proviso proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was regarded as pending, but not to be acted upon until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and other gentlemen had perfected the section. And if the previous question should now be called and seconded, and the main question be ordered, it would not exhaust itself until a vote had been taken upon the proviso offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] The gentleman from Ohio can call the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], and the amendment to that amendment moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well: I will call the previous question upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 85, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Chanler, Coffroth, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Thornton, and Whaley—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Davis, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Shelby, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Bergen, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Culom, Culyer, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Laffin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McRuer, Morrill, Moulton, Noel, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Sawyer, Seefeld, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—75.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call, Mr. NIBLACK stated that Mr. KERR had paired with Mr. HILL.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DEMING. I ask the privilege of making a personal explanation.

Mr. CONKLING. I insist on my motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes sixteen, noes not counted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DEMING. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMING. A discussion arose yesterday upon a personal matter, between the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the gentleman from New York immediately on my right, [Mr. RAYMOND.] I paid but little attention to the discussion as it progressed; but on reading the report in full in the Globe of this morning, I feel it due to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to add a few words to the disclaimer which he then uttered, that he was not responsible for the paragraph in the Times, which was first read by the gentleman from New Jersey, and which was afterward commented upon by various gentlemen of the House.

I was not present in the House when the bankrupt bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] I shortly afterward saw the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] the author of the bill which was acted on recently by the House, and who, as we all know, has labored assiduously during the last two sessions to perfect that bill; and he informed me that the bill presented by the gentleman from New York was the identical bill which he himself had so laboriously prepared. I thought but little of the circumstance at the time; but a day or two later, I saw a paragraph in the New York Herald which affirmed distinctly that the bill offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was a more perfect bill than the one which had been presented by the chairman of the committee on the bankrupt law; that it was such a bill as could not be picked to pieces in debate; that it was a bill which embodied all the legal acumen of the House, and a bill which the author of the paragraph thought would certainly pass. It seemed to me that, under the circumstances, gross injustice was done by that paragraph to the gentleman from Rhode Island; and upon exhibiting the paper to various members of the House, they concurred with me in that opinion, and agreed with me that the injustice should be corrected. I went to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] and pointed out specifically the points wherein I deemed gross injustice was done to the gentleman from Rhode Island, and I asked of him the privilege of making in his paper a correction of that paragraph, solely for the purpose of vindicating, as I conceived, the merits and the ability of the gentleman from Rhode Island. I stated to the reporter of the Times the facts of the case, to wit, that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who had voted against the bill of the gentleman from Rhode Island, had subsequently introduced that identical bill.

I did not make this statement with the intention of placing the gentleman from New York invidiously before the country in any respect; I was unconscious of being animated by any motives inimical to him; and if the result of my interference in this matter and the making of these statements to the reporter has either injured his feelings or prejudiced him before the public, I wish to make this public disavowal of any such intention, and to tender him an apology.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a moment—

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from New York making a personal explanation?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire merely to acknowledge the courtesy and kindness which have prompted the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] to make the explanation which he has just made.

In the colloquy which took place yesterday between my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] and myself, I did not feel at liberty to go any further than I did in disavowing any responsibility for the paragraph which appeared in the Times, because I did not wish directly or indirectly to draw into the affair any gentleman without having had previous consultation with him. I feel obliged to the gentleman from Connecticut for stating what is the simple fact, that I had nothing whatever to do with originating, inspiring, composing, or printing that paragraph.

Now, if the House will indulge me one moment longer, I beg to say that my position here in a twofold capacity, as a member of Congress and as the editor of a newspaper, puts me sometimes in an embarrassing posture. I am quite ready always at the proper time and in the proper place to be responsible to anybody for anything I may say or do. I beg to add that I do not think the floor of Congress a proper place for making an explanation or for taking responsibility for things said or done; and hereafter I wish it distinctly understood while I will on the floor respond to any gentleman for anything I may say here, I will not hold myself subject to being questioned. I will not hold myself bound to answer any question which may be put to me here upon this floor for what I may say or do or what may be said or done in the columns of the New York Times. I will answer in the columns of the New York Times, when addressed as editor of the New York Times, for anything I may say or do in that capacity.

RECONSIDERATION OF A VOTE.

Mr. MARSTON entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which an amendment to the third section of the Army bill offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was adopted yesterday.

EVIDENCE IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House evidence in the contested-election cases of Boyd against Kelso and Koontz against Coffroth; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, the House (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DELANO: The petition of James Colvin, Thomas Black, and 1,000 others, wool-growers of Muskingum county, Ohio, praying for an increase of duty on foreign wools imported into the United States.

Also, the memorial of James Cather, trustee and deacon of the Baptist church at Glenville, Gilmer county, West Virginia, praying indemnity for the use of the church property by United States troops.

Also, the petition of John Kugler, for indemnity for use of property at Camp Dennison, Ohio, by United States military authority.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK: The petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for just and equal laws for regulation of inter-State insurances.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of J. R. Daily, charging fraud and mismanagement on the part of the American Colonization Society, and asking relief.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The memorial of General C. H. Van Wyck, of Orange county, New York, asking that pensions may be increased and the laws so modified that persons entitled thereto may obtain the same with less delay and perplexity than at present.

Also, the memorial of General C. H. Van Wyck, asking that three light guns, captured at Duigle's Mills, South Carolina, in April, 1865, may be deposited at Washington's headquarters, at Newburg, New York.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of 18 officers of the State Legislature of Pennsylvania, praying your honorable body to protect the wool-growers of the United States, by imposing a duty of ten cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound; and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem be levied on all like wool, the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools, and trebled on scoured wools.

Also, the memorial of 25 members of the State Senate of Pennsylvania, praying your honorable body to protect the wool-growers of the United States by imposing a duty of ten cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound; and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem be levied on all like wool the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools, and trebled on scoured wools.

Also, the memorial of 82 members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, praying your honorable body to protect the wool-growers of the United States by imposing a duty of ten cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound; and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem be levied on all like wool, the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools, and trebled on scoured wools.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Meadville, Pennsylvania, praying your honorable body for a further protection to the wool-growers of the United States by imposing a duty of ten cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound; and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem be levied on all like wool, the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools, and trebled on scoured wools.

Also, the memorial of 28 distillers and dealers in domestic spirits in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, respectfully representing that the exaction of personal security for the payment of duties on spirits deposited in general bonded warehouses entirely out of the hands of the owner is, in effect, a heavy tax upon trade without any substantial advantage to the revenue, but, on the contrary, will have a tendency to diminish it by driving out of business all but the wealthiest houses. Your petitioners, therefore, pray your honorable body for the passage of a law requiring the simple obligation of the party storing spirits to pay the duties before removing, in lieu of the bonds now required by law.

Also, the memorial of 58 members of the bar, practicing in the Federal courts at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, respectfully remonstrating against the passage of the bill to reorganize the Federal judiciary, now before the Senate of the United States, for the following reasons, &c.

Also, the petition of 54 citizens and wool-growers of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying your honorable body to impose a duty of ten cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound; and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem be levied on all like wools, the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools, and trebled on scoured wools.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition, numerous signed by citizens of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, asking an increase of duties on foreign wools.

By Mr. MARSTON: The petition of William James, and others, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying that the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, that $192,000 be paid to the officers and crew of the Kearsarge for the destruction of the Alabama, be carried into effect.

Also, the petition of Micajah Lunt, and 33 others, for the same object.

By Mr. McKEE: The petition of 600 soldiers of the tenth, fortieth, and forty-fifth Kentucky volunteers, asking a bounty equal to $100 per year be paid them for the time they served in the United States Army.

By Mr. MOOREHEAD: A petition from citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law to permit steamboats to carry gunpowder when packed in kegs made of iron.

By Mr. MORRIS: Four petitions, numerous signed by citizens and wool-growers of the twenty-fifth congressional district of New York, asking for an increase of duty on imported wool.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of S. Kidder, and 135 others, citizens of Salem, Kenosha county, Wisconsin, for increase of tariff on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of John J. Myrick, and 59 others, citizens of Lyons, Walworth county, Wisconsin, for increase of duty on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of S. S. Derbyshire, and 76 others, citizens of Pleasant Prairie, Kenosha county, Wisconsin, for an increase of tariff on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of James Bonnell, and 35 others, individuals and firms of Milwaukee, for the enactment of a Federal insurance law.

Also, the petition of Thomas C. Williams, and 18 others, citizens of Yorkville, Racine county, Wisconsin, for increase of duty on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of Thomas Dale, and 23 others, citizens of Yorkville, Racine county, Wisconsin, for increase of tariff on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of Delos Hale, and 35 others, citizens of Oconomowoc and Summit, Wisconsin, for the enactment of a Federal insurance law.

Also, the petition of Aretas Bailey, and 65 others, citizens of Caldwell's Prairie, Racine county, Wisconsin, for increase of duty on foreign wools.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The petition of Charity, mother of Stephen W. Weed, killed at Gettysburg to be placed on the pension-list.

By Mr. SMITH: A petition from the Board of Trade of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, praying Congress to purchase the Oakland grounds near that city, and the Government property thereon, for the purpose of establishing a cavalry depot school of instruction.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois: The petition of Charles S. Burt, and others, of Illinois, manufacturers of agricultural implements, for reduction of the tax on the same.

By Mr. WINDOM: The petition of J. H. Holland, and 63 others, citizens of Morristown, Rice county, Minnesota, asking for the passage of a law equalizing soldiers' bounties.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The petition Z. H. Cunliffe, and 66 others, citizens of Arlington, Bennington county, Vermont, for an increased protection to American wool.

Also, the petition of John Balis, and 37 others, citizens of Benson, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an additional protection on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Asa Collins, and 27 others, citizens of Chittenden, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for additional duty on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Henry C. Gleason, and 40 others, citizens of Shrewsbury, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increase of duty on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Hiram Jones, and others, citizens of Waitsfield, Washington county, Vermont, praying for an additional duty on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Boswell Bottum, and 103 others, and Charles Bacon, and 69 others, for same purpose.

Also, the petition of H. B. McLure, and 42 others, citizens of Middletown, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on wool.

Also, the petition of James Rice, and 33 others, citizens of Pownet, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increase of duty on imported wool.

Also, the petition of Seneca Root, and others, citizens of Hubbardston, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increased protection to American wool.

Also, the petition of Nathaniel Sherman, and others, citizens of Plainfield and Marshfield, Washington county, Vermont, praying for an additional duty on wool.

Also, the petition of Emory H. Clark, and 42 others, citizens of East Cabot, Washington county, Vermont, praying for an increase of the tariff upon the importations of foreign wools into this country.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, information in relation to the rinderpest or cattle plague; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of the accounts of Superintendent Sells and Agents Snow and Dunn, of the southern Indian superintendency, for the fourth quarter of 1865, with a copy of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWARD. I present the petition of Mrs. Abby Green, formerly of Richmond, Virginia, praying for the passage of a bill for her relief on account of services rendered and losses incurred in behalf of the Union cause at Richmond, Virginia, from August, 1863, to February, 1864. I beg to state in regard to this petitioner that she assisted Mrs. Quarles very materially in rescuing Colonel Streight and his party from imprisonment at Richmond. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. WADE. I present the memorial of Sue Murphy, and various documents in proof of her claim, setting forth that she was the owner of a house near Chattanooga which was ordered to be taken down for the purpose of erecting fortifications upon the spot where it was built. The memorial is strongly recommended by many officers, and among them those who ordered it destroyed. She claims to have been a loyal person. I move that the memorial and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON presented additional papers in relation to the claim of William C. Anderson; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of such just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds, as may be effectual in establishing the greatest security for the interests protected by policies, and promotive of the greatest good and convenience to all concerned in such transactions; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of their pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Martha McCook, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 463) for the relief of James Foster, reported it adversely, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 464) for the relief of John Gordon;

A bill (H. R. No. 460) granting a pension to Spencer Kellogg; and

A bill (H. R. No. 371) to grant a pension to Leonard St. Clair.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of Iowa, remonstrating against any diversion of the funds, and against any legislation that would be injurious to the extension of the Dubuque and Sioux City railroad, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 197) to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIDDLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 271) to authorize a special tax for the purpose of improving the Washington city canal; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 272) to authorize the corporation of Washington to reduce the width and improve the avenues and streets of that city; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDUGALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 273) to authorize the President to convey to William P. Rogers and his associates the island of Yerba Buena, or Goat Island, in the harbor of San Francisco; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire simply to observe that when this bill was first placed in my hands I had great doubts of its propriety, but after looking at it carefully and being better informed, I think it is a bill to the profit of the Government. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

HICKEY'S CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing for the use of the Senate — copies of Hickey's edition of the Constitution: Provided, That the compilation be brought down to the present time on the same plan.

ARMY BREVET APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, the proceedings of the military board recently convened in St. Louis, Missouri, in relation to brevet appointments in the regular Army.

NEGOTIATION OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs a joint resolution, making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, was introduced by me yesterday and laid upon the table, and I stated that I should move to take it up this morning. It is very important that we should have immediate action on the subject, and I now move that that resolution be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes. It proposes to appropriate $121,785 77, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the President to negotiate treaties with the Indian tribes of the upper Missouri and Platte rivers, to be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it is well known that hostilities have been going on between the United States and the bands of Sioux Indians and the other Indians upon the upper Missouri and the upper Platte for several years at a very great expense, but that last fall the military authorities, under instructions both from the War Department and the Interior Department, entered into arrangements to bring about peace between the United States and those various bands. With several of these bands of Sioux treaties have already been made and peace has been effected. The War Department, or those having charge of our military operations, it seems, have invited the Indians of several other bands to meet at several of the forts of the United States with a view to negotiate treaties of peace and amity with those bands, and the Secretary of War called upon General Curtis to make estimates of what would be necessary in the negotiation of those treaties, as the Indians are brought together generally in bands and brought together almost entire; and the Government of the United States, while they are together and during the pendency of the negotiation, is compelled to furnish supplies to feed the Indians and to make some presents to them. The War Department called upon General Curtis to make an estimate, and he made an estimate to the Secretary of War, and it seems that at the time the Secretary of War, supposing that they had sufficient rations and supplies to attend to this matter, so informed General Curtis. I read from his letter:

"The Secretary of War informed me that the articles necessary to make up these supplies at the various points would be sent forward immediately."

It seems that on a communication from General Pope to General Grant and to the War Department that the War Department has not these supplies to furnish. The Indians are invited to assemble and the time is fixed, but the military authorities are without the supplies necessary to feed them during the pendency of the negotiations, and the matter is now thrown on the Interior Department, and the Interior Department have asked a special appropriation from Congress to meet these expenditures, sending forward the estimates by items of what the expenditures must necessarily be at each of these forts where the Indians have been invited to assemble.

Mr. BROWN. Where are the forts?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Fort Sully, Fort Rice, Fort Berthold, Fort Union, and Fort Laramie, five different places. I have received a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior of the 12th instant, and I will read a portion of it to the Senate:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant, inclosing copies of correspondence between your Department and the Secretary of War in relation to the subsistence of Indians about to assemble in council at Fort Laramie and at various points on the upper Missouri river, and instructing me to make estimates of what supplies may be needed to provide for the occasion, adding transportation and subsistence for the commissioners."

"I have also to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, inclosing a communication from Major General Pope, of March 16, with vouchers for services rendered by 'Big Ribs' and party, sent as messengers to the hostile Indians; and by reference from your Department of another communication from Major General Pope, of the 21st ultimo, inclosing vouchers of presents made to said 'Big Ribs,' the whole amounting to $5,456 11, which you instruct me to embrace in my estimate of the required appropriation. In conformity with these instructions, I have prepared the desired estimate, but wish to call your attention to the within copy of a letter from Major General S. R. Curtis, addressed to this office, and dated March 2, 1866, in which he states that in compliance with instructions from the honorable Secretary of War, he had made estimates and requisitions on the War Department for the necessary rations to feed these Indians, and for transportation of said subsistence to Fort Laramie and other places of treaty rendezvous in the upper Missouri country, and that the Secretary of War had informed him that 'the articles necessary' to make up these supplies at the various points would be sent forward immediately."

"In view of the fact that the Indians referred to were called together by the military authorities in the early part of last winter, while the commissioners could not meet them until summer, their subsistence by the War Department seemed to me perfectly just and proper, and I placed implicit reliance on the assurance given by the honorable Secretary of War as above stated. It now, however, appears that as late as the 24th ultimo Major General Pope telegraphs from St. Louis to Lieutenant General Grant that he trusts the Interior Department is making proper arrangements for feeding the numerous bands of Indians assembling at Fort Laramie and on the upper Missouri river, adding that the military authorities have not the means to meet such extraordinary demands outside of their legitimate province; and that if the Indians are under the charge of the Interior Department that Department should take care of such matters, and not depend on the military.

"The Secretary of War, in his letter of the 25th ultimo, sends you a copy of the above telegram, and referring to a conversation in Cabinet meeting, desires to be informed what measures have been taken by your Department to provide for the Indians about to assemble in council.

"In your reply of the same date you state that no arrangements whatever had been made, as you did not understand the Secretary to say definitely at Cabinet meeting that his Department could not furnish the subsistence for the purpose referred to, but would communicate with you in writing on the subject.

"A final communication from the honorable the Secretary of War, in reply to the above and bearing the same date, concludes the correspondence on the subject, the Secretary stating that he designed the conversation at Cabinet meeting as final and to the point, but as you appear to have not so understood the matter," he adds, "You will please consider the application for supplies from the War Department as definitely answered in the negative, for the reason that they cannot be furnished under legal authority, nor without prejudice to the military service.

"I have thus reviewed the correspondence in connection with the facts of the case in order to show that no blame can be justly attached to this Department for not having at an earlier date made necessary preparations for the assistance called for."

By some mistake it was supposed—General Curtis so understood it, and it was so understood by the Secretary of War—that the War Department would send on the supplies to feed these Indians during these councils and to provide what was necessary to be done in the negotiation of these treaties; but subsequently, on further examination, it seems the War Department cannot do it; at all events, they decline to do it, and the matter is thrown upon the Interior Department, and we must make this appropriation; otherwise these Indians are called together at these councils and there will be no provision made for them while they are there, and it may result in further hostilities and trouble.

Mr. President, I have stated the circumstances under which this application is made. It came to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday, and it was urged by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior that we should take immediate action because of the immense distance that these provisions and supplies have to be transported, and because the period fixed, as I understand, for the assembling of the Indians is the 20th of May, and no time should be lost. I therefore hope the resolution will pass at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. I need not remind the Senate that I have always opposed appropriations for Indian treaties on the ground that I have always been opposed to this mode of dealing with Indians. Besides that, my attention is now called to a letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on Finance to whom this subject properly belongs, and to whom the estimates for the negotiation of new treaties are generally sent to be included in the Indian appropriation bill, and they are generally examined by the Committee on Finance. I have in my hands a large number of estimates containing the details of this sum of one hundred and twenty-one thousand and odd dollars. It is a sum extraordinarily large. Indeed, the largest sum I ever remember to have been appropriated for making an Indian treaty is about twenty thousand dollars. This is $121,785. We have not had time or occasion to examine these documents in detail, because the Indian appropriation bill has not yet come to the Senate. These papers would have been examined by us at the time we received them but for the fact that we supposed they were intended to apply to the Indian appropriation bill which has not yet come to us. Now, unless the Senator from Wisconsin can satisfy the Senate that there is pressing and urgent necessity for action on this appropriation, I do not see why we should pass a separate bill. It is unusual to do so. My own opinion is that some Senator would distinguish himself as a valuable public servant who would take hold of this whole matter and transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department, or organize some other mode of treating with Indian tribes than treating them like foreign nations. The idea of getting together the head men of the Indian tribes and giving them pork and beans—very sensible articles of food—feeding them up and then negotiating a treaty with them, and bringing that treaty in here to be ratified as a high negotiation with a foreign Power, has always seemed to me so ridiculous that I hope some time or other the Senate will abolish the whole system. These Indians will be gathered together as a grand conclave, they will have a Fourth of July celebration for about two or three weeks, and they will sign anything presented to them by the Indian agents. This $121,000 will be used as a corruption fund—not improperly by the officers of the Government, but it will be used to make these Indians feel good while it lasts, and then the agent sent there to negotiate a treaty will write out what he pleases and they will sign it, without any knowledge of what is contained in it; and if they are satisfied with the terms of it afterward, well and good; if not, they will take up the tomahawk and the rifle and commence a war, if they are incited to it by white men.

That mode of dealing with the Indians has always seemed to me so ridiculous that I never had any patience in examining these matters. But if the Senate still insists on that policy of negotiating treaties with the Indian tribes, the Committee on Indian Affairs must take the responsibility for this appropriation, because the Committee on Finance to whom these papers were referred have never yet had time to examine them; nor has the proper occasion arrived when we could examine them. It would have been our duty, of course, to examine the details of these estimates if the Indian appropriation bill had come to us before this time and an amendment had been proposed to that bill to meet this object. I have not even read these papers; my attention has been just this moment called to the fact that the whole subject was referred to the Committee on Finance. I shall therefore take no responsibility as to the amount involved or as to the necessity of the appropriation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Indian appropriation bill will probably not be here until the last of the session, and the 20th of May is the time fixed for the Indians to meet and for the supplies to be at Fort Laramie, Fort Rice, Fort Sully, and Fort Union on the upper Missouri, and Fort Berthold.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask by what authority these tribes are to be convened.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was upon this authority: we were at war with them, and the military authorities, under the direction of the War Department and the Interior Department, the President of course being responsible, invited these tribes to treat. When my friend from Ohio speaks of the estimates sent to the Finance Committee I am inclined to think that he is looking at the estimates to carry into effect treaties already ratified.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. GRIMES. Are these tribes that we have been at war with?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Some of them are.

Mr. GRIMES. We have been at peace with some.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have been at war with the Sioux and the Blackfeet. In relation to the time I wish to say a word.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator. As I understand it, we have not been at war with many of these Indians that it is proposed to treat with. There may have been additional murders or atrocities perpetrated by some of them; but my impression is that we have treated with most of those Indians with whom we have been at war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have not treated with them all.

Mr. GRIMES. What I want to know is this: does not the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs contemplate treaties with Indian tribes with whom we have not been at war, and if so, why do we propose to treat with those particular tribes that we are already at peace with?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, Mr. President—Mr. McDOUGALL. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow me.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, for a moment. I will refer to some papers I have here, and answer the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have known, probably, more of the Indians that traverse our Rocky mountains and the regions further west than any of my colleagues here in the Senate. I have known Indians from my boyhood. The policy of the Government in dealing with them, I think, has always been wrong. I agree with the Senator from Ohio altogether in that respect. They must be whipped into their place, and subjected to obedience. Why should not the Indian earn his bread by the sweat of his brow? Why should he not do it with his bow and arrow, or other material that he may possess? Why should he be supported by the Government? It is false legislation, and it is one of those things that oppress the men who do honest labor in the country—that labor which supports our Government. It is wrong. I have been opposed to it as a matter of policy always, and I take occasion now to give expression to my thought. I met a lot of Choctaws last night—and I can talk Choctaw—three chiefs who flattered in their peacock feathers. We buy them those feathers, and we buy them their blankets. Why should we do it? I have never been able to find that out by any logical deduction. We do not owe them anything but this: we should protect them on their hunting grounds. That I am prepared to do always, and let them die out by a law established by a greater Master than confines himself to this sphere, as another race that inhabit about the District of Columbia is to die out. No man can suggest a good logical reason why we should subsidize the Indians. My friend from Wisconsin, who is a western man, and who is acquainted somewhat with the subject, cannot advance a reason why we should subsidize them; tax our farmers and laboring men, and our mechanics, to subsidize the Indian, to come down here and parade his feathers in Washington, and draw our blankets. It cannot be done; it is not within the range of logic. I am, therefore, against the whole policy.

Mr. RAMSEY. This war commenced with the Issanti Sioux, in Minnesota, numbering about six or seven thousand. It extended then to the Yantoni Sioux, in the northern part of Dakota, and also to a part of the Yantoni Sioux, in southern Dakota, and also to the larger part of the Teton Sioux west of the Missouri, comprising the Blackfeet and other bands, so that the whole Sioux tribe on the plains are demoralized and infected with this war spirit. I do not see how entire peace and quiet can be restored to the frontiers unless through some treaty arrangement. It may require a little money, but surely—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Let me ask the Senator, would it not be better to whip them well?

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly it would, if you could catch them, but that is the great difficulty.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is not the Government powerful, and has it not men and horses enough?

Mr. RAMSEY. On those immense plains in Dakota, and on the Platte, it is impossible for any armed force you can send there to overtake them.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If you furnish General Sully the horses and men, he will hunt them to the death.

Mr. RAMSEY. But that would take ten times as much money as this treaty arrangement will cost. Besides, there are large bodies of these Sioux that you cannot possibly reach; our men cannot get at them; they live on the British frontier. All of the Issanti Sioux, the most hostile and most bloody of all the Dakotas, now live on the northern border, and after committing depredations retreat across the line, and you cannot follow them. They keep poisoning the minds of other bands of Sioux. I do not see how it is possible to restore peace on the frontier unless we can do it by some treaty arrangement of this kind. The expense is nothing in comparison with the object to be accomplished.

Mr. McDUGALL. There can be no peace restored among the Indians on our frontier except by compelling them to obedience.

Mr. RAMSEY. The trouble is to catch them. I admit that the Senator is right in that, but it is impossible, on these immense plains, to catch these bands of Indians. We have had a large number of troops operating against them for years, but they have very rarely been able to overtake the Indians.

Mr. McDUGALL. They were never well mounted.

Mr. RAMSEY. The great difficulty is in carrying provender for your horses on these immense interior wastes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there is but one way to deal with these Indians on the plains: you must feed them or fight them. There is not much honor to be won by the Army or by the Government in fighting with these Indians. Compared with us, they are a very feeble people. We are strong; we are a great nation. They are wandering nomads over the plains, with no more habitation than the buffalo has. They go with the buffalo, and where the buffalo goes. They live upon the buffalo, and with the buffalo, and range over those vast plains. The honorable Senator from California suggests that we should by military power reduce them to subjection and compel them to obedience. Whenever we meet them we can conquer them and capture and slaughter them; but it is just as impossible, within any reasonable amount of expenditure, to catch these Indians and reduce them to obedience by war as it is to catch the buffalo upon the plains or the blackbirds that fly over the plains. Sir, the proposition to organize great military expeditions with artillery, to go through these immense plains and to carry provender for horses, where every bushel will cost you from three to five and even ten dollars to feed the horses on which you ride, is a proposition to put the finances of the Government into a bottomless pit.

I know it costs something to keep these Indians together and feed them; it costs something to make treaties with them. My friend from Ohio smiles at the idea of a treaty with an Indian tribe. He thinks the thing is ridiculous on its face. Compared with a treaty with Great Britain, I admit it is a very trivial affair; but so long as human nature is composed of those elements which dwell even in the breast of an Indian as well as a white man, by manifestations of friendship, by kind treatment, by presents, by feeding them, you can have peace with them better than by fighting with them, and at a hundredth part of the expense.

Mr. McDUGALL. Let me ask the Senator, is not that a policy to continue the controversy with them for many years, and will it not be in the end more expensive?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have been at war with these Sioux since 1862. I have no doubt the expenditures of the Government in prosecuting wars against the Sioux, on these plains, have amounted to over thirty million dollars. There is a difference between making appropriations to the Interior Department to feed Indians, and making appropriations to the War Department to furnish the commissary department, or the transportation department with supplies. You come into Congress with an estimate from the War Department for commissary supplies, and in a single bill of appropriation you will appropriate $400,000,000 perhaps, all in one immense fund, which is drawn upon by the War Department at will; and so it is with the quartermaster's department; the appropriation is all made in one vast sum. But when we come to ask for appropriations for the Interior Department, you go into the items and take them up one case at a time.

Now, we have negotiated several treaties, under the direction of the President, through the instrumentality of the War Department, with several bands of these Sioux Indians. They were fed by the War Department, and Congress never heard anything about it. Why not? Because it was paid for out of the funds of the commissary department and the quartermaster's department, and we never knew anything about it. But now, when the War Department say they have not the funds and cannot furnish the commissary supplies any longer, the Interior Department must furnish supplies to these very Indians whom the War Department have invited into council to see if we can have peace with them; and when the Interior Department presents its estimates before Congress and we look into them, they appear to be very large. The sum to be appropriated here is $121,000, but it is not for a single treaty. The Indians are invited to meet at five different posts, hundreds of miles from each other, some on the upper Platte, some on the upper Missouri. I suppose they will assemble, and if they assemble, and the War Department is not prepared to feed them during the assembling, what shall be done with them? If we do not make this appropriation, the Interior Department cannot furnish them supplies. If they come together at our invitation and then disperse, they will regard it as a kind of breach of faith on our part to invite them together in this way to negotiate for a treaty and make no provision for them while they are there.

I admit that abuses creep into the Indian department, as is the case in every department where money is to be expended. Abuses creep in from the infirmity of human nature. Men are tempted to take advantage of the Government on contracts. Men are sometimes tempted to defraud the Government; and in dealing with the Indians perhaps the temptation may be stronger, if the Indians are the only witnesses of their transactions. But after all it is much cheaper for us to deal with the Indians in this way than it is to deal with them by arms. I say to my honorable friend from California that I think there is just as much honor, and a great deal more humanity, in feeding and blanketing and making presents to these Indians than there is in chasing them over the plains and slaughtering them, with their wives and children. I hope that this resolution will pass.

Mr. WILSON. How much does it appropriate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars to pay the expenses of their assembling at five different posts. Some two thousand are expected at one place; fifteen hundred at another, fifteen hundred at another, &c.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not dispute the point of present judgment with the Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whose particular business it is to understand the present question. Indeed, I think he is altogether right in the present statement of what he desires to have done by the Government. I think he is altogether wrong, though, in the philosophy of his policy. The remarks that I made some few minutes since were designed rather to express my view of what should be the policy than what might be the proper thing now to be done. I understand that our Government through its proper officers has invited, for treaty purposes, the Sioux Indians north of forty-five degrees into council. This having been done, it should be exactly executed, for the faith of the Government is involved in it. My remarks, when I rose before, were directed to the permanent policy, not the present action. Those Indians having been assured that we will treat with them, and having been invited to meet us, they must be treated as they have been treated heretofore.

I only wish to say now that I desire to have done with that policy. I do not think that we have been out of the order of life or nature because the Indian has retroceded from the country where he was born, westward and westward still, crowded by the progress of high civilization. I do not think that wrong. I think it is one of the provisions of the Master that thus it should be so. It is pleasant to me to think that the country that I properly inhabit is now occupied by the Caucasian race, and it there masters. It must happen so, for there is a progression of races, and that progression we have seen through all ages, from the Pelasgi and the fair-haired men from the North who came down from old Scandinavia and made the heroes of Greece and then in Rome; they who conquered, debilitated, and demoralized Italy. All these things indicate that there is a progression of races. I would not willingly injure one of the race who inhabited our country when the first white man landed on these shores. I am partial to the Indian race. I was taught in my childhood by the Oneidas—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask that the order of the day may lie over informally until we can come to a vote on this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, the order of the day will be informally laid aside, and the joint resolution which was under discussion will still be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to take up any further time; but I have before me the letter of General Curtis in which he states the number of Indians that are expected to assemble at these different posts: at Fort Laramie, twenty-five hundred; at Fort Sully, two thousand; at Fort Rice, two thousand; at Fort Berthold, two thousand; at Fort Union, twenty-five hundred. It will be seen, therefore, that there are two thousand Indians and upward to assemble at each one of these posts, and therefore I think the estimate is not an extravagant one.

Mr. NESMITH. I look upon this as a matter of very great importance, and I hope we shall have the immediate action of the Senate upon it. It is very well understood that during the last season great efforts were made to reduce the Indians of the upper Missouri and from there to Montana to some state of subjection or of peace. They had given great annoyance to travelers and settlers in Dakota and Minnesota as well as on the overland route. The energies of the Government were directed last summer to their subjugation. Failing in that, it was deemed by the military officers and the officers brought in contact with those people that it was better to inaugurate some system by which a treaty could be made with them, that it would be cheaper for the Government and better for all parties concerned that some amicable arrangement should be made which should secure peace on the frontier and on the plains. The energies of the officers of the Army and other Government officials who were brought in contact with them last year were directed to that purpose. The result was that arrangements were made whereby large numbers of them are to assemble early this spring for the purpose of concluding temporary treaties formed by the military who were in that country last summer.

Under that arrangement it is expected that within a few days large numbers of these people will be assembled at different points. They come with the express guarantee and understanding on the part of the Government officials that certain supplies shall be furnished them while there. We may question the right of the officers to make this pledge in advance; but that is a point of which an Indian has no very correct comprehension. When he meets a Government official and he pledges himself to do a certain thing, he regards that as the pledge of the Government. The Indian does not comprehend that the officer may not be authorized to make pledges in advance whereby large sums of money shall be disbursed before appropriation bills are passed by Congress.

That is a matter that cannot be brought to the comprehension of the Indian. He treats with the officer and looks upon him as one fully authorized to enter into and make these arrangements; and when a failure comes to carry out the provisions or stipulations made between that officer and the Indian, the Indian is bound to look upon it as a species of bad faith exercised on the part of the Government, and consequently he considers himself justified in resorting to hostilities for what he considers the bad faith of the Government.

The view in which the Indian looks upon this matter is that the Government is pledged to certain things, and the certain things to which it is pledged are set forth in detail in this report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It is an estimate showing all the details, all that is necessary to carry out substantially the temporary treaties which were formed last year and to meet the Indians this spring, as was understood and arranged between the officers of the Government and the Indians at that time. It provides for large bodies of Indians being assembled at each place; for instance, fifteen hundred Indians are notified to assemble on the 20th of May at Fort Sully; then, again, fifteen hundred more are notified to assemble on the 1st of June at Fort Rice; at Fort Berthold fifteen hundred Indians are notified to assemble on the 20th of June; and at Fort Union two thousand Indians are notified to assemble on the 5th of July; at Fort Laramie two thousand Indians are notified to assemble on the 20th of May, and so on. These different assemblages have to be provided for. The Indians have been notified that they are expected to assemble there in pursuance of the negotiations which have been had with them. They are doubtless now on the way to these different points of rendezvous; and if this appropriation fails to pass, I apprehend that we shall have a repetition of the scenes of bloodshed, outrage, murder, and plunder which have been going on for the last two years in that country.

The urgency for the passage of this resolution consists in this fact: that the Indians being on the way to the different points of rendezvous it is impossible to wait until the general appropriation bill can pass Congress to carry out the objects contemplated by this resolution and by this detailed statement which I now hold in my hand. If we delay it until that time the period will have long passed when the Indians shall have assembled and this distribution of supplies should have taken place among them. Therefore, for the preservation of peace in that vast region of country, and in view of the objects which the military officers report can probably be accomplished—the making of a permanent peace there and preventing a recurrence of hostilities hereafter—I urge on the Senate the adoption of the resolution. On an examination of the details of the estimates, as submitted by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I think they will be found most reasonable, and the sum is not so large as to excite any very great apprehensions on the part of Congress or of the country if we are to realize what I apprehend we shall from this general negotiation—a restoration of peace on the frontiers and on the plains.

Mr. RAMSEY. In addition to the other considerations which have been urged here on behalf of this appropriation, I desire to mention the fact that at this time many thousands of our people are passing up the Missouri river; many boats have already left St. Louis on their way up to Montana; two thousand miles of that route are through this hostile country; and these Indians, as the Senator from Oregon has said, will look upon the failure to furnish these supplies as a breach of faith on the part of the Government; and if our commissioners do not meet them with the supplies, they will seek revenge on the people going up there; and no man can tell what destruction of life and property will ensue.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I wish to get at, and what these Senators on the Committee on Indian Affairs have not yet told us, is, who authorized the assembling of these Indian tribes. I have looked in these papers, and I cannot tell who did it. Was it the Secretary of the Interior, anticipating an appropriation from Congress? I see nothing to show that. Did the Commissioner of Indian Affairs undertake to make six new treaties with some ten thousand hostile Indians without authority of law? If not, who did it? Or was it left to some wandering Indian agent or superintendent of Indian affairs?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to state on that subject the facts. During the last year hostilities were prevailing all over the plains. General Curtis was in command, General Sully being with the expedition far northwest, General Dodge down on the Arkansas. It will be remembered by my honorable friend that a committee was appointed on the part of Congress last year to inquire into Indian affairs; and the gentleman who now sits in the chair, [Mr. FOSTER,] myself, and other gentlemen, were appointed upon that committee. When we were upon the upper Arkansas, we were decidedly of the opinion that it was better to make peace with these Indians than it was to carry on this system of warfare, which was so enormously expensive and produced such very little results so far as the capturing of any of the Indians was concerned. We pressed the consideration of it upon the President, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior. They had consultations here in answer to our communications to them by telegraph and otherwise; and we received telegraphic communications from them in return; and upon full consultation in the Cabinet with the President, it was determined to enter upon a system of negotiation of peace with the tribes instead of carrying on hostilities. All the military commanders were so directed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, upon instructions that were agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the Interior Department, with the sanction of the President. Commissioners were appointed to negotiate treaties of peace in the Indian country and up the Arkansas.

Among those who were appointed to negotiate treaties on the upper Arkansas were General Harney, who is famous among the Indians as a great general in fighting them, and Kit Carson, who was equally famous. In negotiating the treaties on the Platte and north of the Platte in Dakota, General Curtis, who had been in command of the department, was employed as one of the commissioners, and he entered into those treaties that have been already confirmed. Other gentlemen were with him, General Sully and General Sibley, the very officers of the Army who had had most to do with those Indians and knew the Indians best, and as I understand it General Curtis is the one who invited these Indians to these councils. General Curtis, as I understand, is to go out at the head of the commission with a view of negotiating the very treaties which they are invited to make. This has all been done with the full sanction both of the War Department and the Interior Department and with the express sanction of the President, and I may say upon the urgent recommendation of those gentlemen who were connected with that congressional committee to look into Indian affairs; and I have no doubt that if you carry out the policy and carry it through of negotiating treaties, and if we comply with our treaties in good faith and give them the supplies which we promised, the blankets and provisions which we promised, we may have peace with them at a tithe of the expense of dealing with them by the sword. These are the facts.

I know, as my honorable friend knows, that dealing with these Indians is a very different thing from dealing with a great nation like England or France; and of all the committees, I doubt not, in the Senate of the United States, there is no committee that has so difficult a task to manage and get along with as this very Indian Committee; dealing with them is so uncertain. It is after all an experiment. We are dealing with a feeble people, with a dying people; they will soon pass away, and nothing will remain of the Indian tribes but the beautiful names which they gave to our rivers and our towns. This is to be their inevitable destiny; but while they are passing along like sick children on our hands, it is better to deal in the spirit of humanity, to feed these dying people, than it is to turn in and slaughter them by the sword. That is my settled conviction from all the information I have been able to obtain in relation to Indian matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. If these Indians had been conveyed by the President of the United States in pursuance of his executive authority to negotiate a treaty of peace and during a war, I have no doubt it is the duty of Congress to appropriate money to carry into effect the executive order. Undoubtedly the President of the United States has the power to negotiate peace with warring nations. If these Indian tribes are warring nations, as they seem to be considered, as a matter of course he has the power to negotiate a treaty of peace with them and submit it to the Senate for approval at the proper time. The only question that arises then would be as to the best mode of meeting the expenditure. As far as I understand the Senator from Wisconsin, the assistance and transportation have been heretofore furnished by the proper bureaus of the War Department, and now, for the first time, it is proposed to introduce into the Indian Office transportation and subsistence of provisions.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What I desired to say was, that in dealing with these tribes in the treaties which were negotiated by General Curtis and by General Harney, the War Department had furnished the supplies; the Interior Department had not done it; and the Interior Department now supposed that the War Department would furnish these, until from a letter received from the Secretary of War the Secretary of the Interior is informed that the War Department cannot do it, and the thing is thrown on the Interior Department, and the Interior Department must take the responsibility of doing it; otherwise, the Indians are invited to meet at these places, and there are no supplies and we do not get peace with them. It is a new cause of irritation and a new cause of war, and that is just the exigency and the necessity pressing upon the Interior Department for our action, and our immediate action. Supposing that the War Department would furnish the supplies to these Indians as they had furnished them to the others, the Interior Department took no steps to procure these appropriations until now. At all events, this is the first request that came to the Indian Committee on the subject. I do not know but that those estimates that went to the Finance Committee may have gone in some weeks ago. I do not know when they went to that committee; but the matter first came to the Indian Committee yesterday, and with the urgent request on the part of the Department that we should take immediate action, because it was necessary to purchase these supplies immediately at St. Louis in order to send them up the Missouri river or get them transported to the place of meeting, which is already fixed, with these Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to press any opposition to this appropriation, because I am deficient of information to do so; but the facts disclosed this morning show clearly, I think, that the Indian Bureau ought to be transferred to the War Department, or all connection with the Indians transferred to the Interior Department. That is manifest from the statements which have been made. Here is confusion between these two Departments of the Government; neither seems to understand its appropriate duties in this respect.

The bill of items submitted to the Committee on Finance is so singular that since I have read it this morning for the first time it strikes me as furnishing a very strong argument why this whole subject ought to be transferred to the War Department. The negotiations ought to be made through military officers, the commanders of troops face to face with the Indians. Then you will have some check on the expenditure. The Senator will see himself that there will be no check here on the expenditure of the money about to be appropriated. In the subsistence department no ration can be drawn except in pursuance of law, and there are forms and modes of checking officers, so that there is a system of accountability which it is almost impossible to overcome. It is almost impossible that frauds can be perpetrated in the Subsistence Bureau of the War Department. So in regard to transportation; that is done under a system of accounts and checks, so that money appropriated for the quartermaster's department is certainly applied to the purposes to which it is appropriated, though sometimes frauds may perhaps be committed. This appropriation, however, will be to another Department of the Government, for supplies of a character over which that Department has not usually had any supervision. These estimates provide for six Indian treaties with the aggregated Indians that have been invited to participate to the amount of something like ten thousand.

The estimates are given in detail in the papers furnished to the Committee on Finance, and show that these Indians expected to be aggregated in masses, men, women, and children meeting together at five or six different forts of the United States, from fifteen hundred to two thousand at each fort, and they are there to be fed on pork, bread, coffee, and the ordinary rations of the Army for a certain time, and treaties of peace are to be negotiated with them. There is no mode of transporting those provisions from the settlements to the forts except by new agencies. The quartermaster's department has its contracts for the transportation of supplies in which competition has been had, proposals have been invited, contracts have been made. But in the transportation of these supplies there will be no competition. The very necessity of immediate action will compel the Department to transport these supplies at whatever cost. The expense of transporting the supplies will be almost equivalent to their original cost. One of the bills presented here shows corn used by one of the scouts sent out cost the Government eight to nine dollars a bushel, when we all know that in Iowa corn is now being burnt for fuel—it is so stated in the papers; and certainly it is not worth over twenty cents a bushel.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to state that the corn which feeds the horses of the Army out there fighting the Indians costs from five to ten dollars a bushel. That is one reason we do not want to go out there with horses fighting the Indians. It costs just as much when the Army transports it out there as when anybody else transports it. In relation to this matter of transportation, I suppose the same price will be paid as for Army transportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no limitation of that kind.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Army transportation is always done by contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. But done under and in pursuance of law which requires the quartermaster's department to contract. This would not be under that law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Still there is a law for contracts in the Interior Department just as much as in the War Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will call the attention of the Senate also to the character of the presents estimated for as part of the $121,000. I will give only a few of the items—thirteen hundred pairs of blankets, to cost $9,750; one hundred and twenty dozen scarlet shirts, cotton handkerchiefs, woolen blouses, thirty thousand yards of fancy prints, and various presents, amounting altogether to about thirty thousand dollars, for some ten thousand Indians. It is not very much for each Indian, but it shows the peculiar mode of making treaties with them. We gather these Indians together at various forts of the United States under military authority; we there feed them for twenty or thirty days, we furnish them blankets and clothing, &c., and then our commissioners—I do not know who they are—write out a treaty of peace, and the Indians sign it, ignorant of its provisions, unable to read, poor, miserable creatures as they are admitted to be; and that treaty is sent to the Senate of the United States, the highest political body in this nation; and how is it considered here? It is ratified, as a matter of course. I remember that in one case when I was a member of the House of Representatives, five Indian treaties were ratified, as I was informed by a Senator, without their being read in the Senate, on the last day of an executive session, and when we came to make up the estimates to carry those treaties into execution, they were so large that they were actually suspended, and not carried out for a time. That was the Oregon case. I believe there was a misunderstanding in regard to the terms of the treaty, and finally it led to a war.

Perhaps this is as good an occasion as any to say that there ought to be an end to this mode of dealing with Indians. I have no doubt these five treaties to be made by General Curtis and others—and no man could be selected in the United States whom I would more cheerfully trust with any power than General Curtis, whom I have known for many years—will be made in this way, and will probably entail on the Government an annuity for a number of years amounting perhaps to from $100,000 to $500,000; I cannot tell how much. The expense of our Indian service now is between two and a half and three million dollars, and the whole number of treaty Indians, so far as I can gather from the best information I can get, does not exceed one hundred and twenty-five thousand; there are other Indians, with whom we have no treaties; so that the cost of governing our Indians is greater than the cost of governing this country during the late war. It amounts probably to from ten to twenty dollars a head; and in addition to that are all the vast sums that are expended through the Army to keep the Indians in subjection. The amount actually appropriated every year for the benefit of the Indian service proper is from two and a half to three million dollars, and that merely to carry into execution treaties and to pay the expenses of agents and superintendents. The number of Indians that are included in our treaty stipulations has been variously estimated from one hundred to three hundred thousand, but I believe it has been more accurately estimated at the lower number, because they are constantly diminishing in number. Then the Indians with whom we have no treaty stipulations are now constantly, year after year, making treaties, thus adding to the expense of our Indian relations.

It seems to me that a system like this conducted in this manner ought to be put a stop to. I have not the information on which I can say that this sum ought not to be appropriated; indeed, it seems that the Government have placed themselves in a position where they have agreed to meet these Indians in council in the way they have heretofore made treaties with them. The stipulation has gone out with the assent of the President of the United States, and the military authorities have undertaken to convene the Indians en masse at various forts of the United States, and I do not see but that we are bound, under the circumstances, to appropriate the money in some form, either to give it to the military authorities, or to the Indian Bureau. It is, however, a fair illustration of the manner of our dealing with the Indian tribes. I have been in hopes for some years that the Indian Committee would report some measure by which the Indians might be transferred to the Military Department, there to be governed by military law until they should be absorbed in the general population of our Territories to be governed by civil law.

I know that some objection has been made to transferring the Indians over to the territorial authorities and to the authorities of the new States, on the ground that there is an antagonism between the whites and the Indians that will lead the white man to disregard the rights of the Indians; but I believe it would be wiser and better to give to the infant States and Territories of the West a portion of the money now appropriated by the Government for the support of the Indians, and trust to the people of the infant States and Territories to govern those tribes, and disband our whole Indian system; or, if that cannot be done on account of the antagonism between the whites and the Indians, then to transfer this whole Indian service to the Army, and let them govern the Indians as subjects of the United States; but the present system of governing the Indians by treaty stipulations, by bribes and presents, beans and corn and pork, furnished at the enormous expense of from ten to twenty dollars a head to every Indian in the United States, is a system that ought not to be tolerated longer.

I will take this occasion to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether a proposition to transfer the Indian service to the War Department is not now pending in that committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; there is a proposition now pending before the committee to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department; but that is not involved in this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not involved, but this is the only manner in which we shall have the question of the Indians before us. We have no opportunity to discuss these Indian matters except when appropriations come before us; and they never come before us unless when there is such an urgent and pressing necessity to make the appropriations that we cannot for humanity's sake stop to deliberate on measures affecting the Indians. A year ago every Senator will remember that a proposition was made to pay over to the Cherokees and other Indians of the Southwest enormous sums of money to relieve them from immediate distress. We had no time to deliberate because the demand was made on us in the name of humanity to feed starving Indians, some of whom had been true and loyal. Indeed, these Indian questions are never brought before us until under such urgent circumstances that we cannot deliberate. There are very few Senators, probably, who would have been willing to authorize the convocation of these Indians en masse in the various forts of the United States for the purpose of making new treaties with them, and the question is now presented to us in such form that we cannot deny the appropriation, simply because the executive authorities of the Government have directed the convening of the Indians and we are bound to feed them while they are there; we are bound to carry their stipulations into effect; we are not left to legislate or to judge in regard to the matter.

Perhaps these remarks may be considered as rather out of order, as they do not affect the immediate question before the Senate. I do not wish to stand here as opposing this appropriation. Probably the faith of the nation is bound to feed these Indians and take care of them in the usual way. So we shall probably be considered bound to ratify the treaty when made, and we shall be bound to appropriate money to carry the treaty into execution. We never shall have a change in this system until one of two policies is adopted, either to transfer the whole Indian service to the War Department, or else to transfer the Indians to the charge of the people of the States and Territories where they live, and that is a proposition which I hope will be adopted before long. I am willing to leave to these new States and Territories the government of the Indian population, and if necessary to give the aid of the Army to govern the Indians, and if it is needed, to distribute to them the $3,000,000 the Indians now cost us to enable them to administer government over them. The system of bribes, treaties, and presents, ought to be abandoned by the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, some of the remarks of my friend from Ohio, I think, challenge a moment's consideration. I do not look upon what we give to the Indians as in the nature of bribes. I do not think that the presents which are given, that what we contract to pay them annually in the shape of provisions and clothing, (for the payment of money to Indians has been almost entirely abandoned; what annuities are paid are paid in clothing, or in provisions, or in some articles which contribute to their support,) should be regarded as bribes. The truth is, the Indians inhabited all this vast country. I do not claim that they held it by a title such as that by which the civilized man holds his land in fee-simple; but they existed, lived, and occupied the country. The Indian thinks, and the world believes, and mankind must admit, that the Great Father above gave him his life, his existence, upon these vast plains, and in this rich and beautiful country. Our people, full of the Anglo-Saxon blood and the Anglo-Saxon disposition to make aggressions everywhere, powerful, increasing, spreading, aggrandizing, press in upon the plains and the prairies and among the mountains to dig for the gold and the silver of the mines of those mountains, where the Indians and their fathers before them perhaps for a thousand years, have lived and held undisputed control. Now, if we enter into all this goodly land, and by our going there, cut off the game upon which the Indian lived, surround him with the institutions of civilization, which are death to the savage man, surround him so that he cannot live in the way in which he was accustomed to live, do we owe him nothing? Is it just in the sight of God or man for us to say that we owe nothing to these people whose land we are appropriating at our pleasure? I cannot feel in that way. I think, therefore, that all we give the Indian, if we give him ten times as much as we do, would not pay him any more than the debt that we really owe.

My honorable friend says we should put this whole service into the hands of the War Department. I do not now discuss the question whether the Indian Bureau would be better managed under the War Department than under the Interior Department. That is not the question that arises on this appropriation bill, and I do not propose to discuss this question in advance of the action of our committee. It is one of the serious questions pending before our committee on which we mean to make a report during the present session for the action of Congress. But, sir, putting the control of the Indians into the hands of the War Department is by no means certain to reduce the actual expenditures of the Government. I will tell you what it may do. It may reduce very much the troubles of Congress; it will certainly reduce the troubles of the Indian Committee; it will reduce the applications for special appropriations in reference to Indian tribes, because the estimates of the War Department will all be made in one grand sum, for the commissary department so many millions, for the quartermaster's department so many millions, for the payment of troops so many millions more. That will involve all your dealings with Indians, and in those great sums you will not see them, you will not feel them, and you will think nothing about them, and say nothing about them. They will come up in the regular Army appropriation bill, and it will all be done in an hour.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that expenditures of this very kind were made for similar purposes last year out of the Army appropriations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, and Congress never heard of it, Congress knew nothing about it, because it was in the Army appropriation bill, and no one can resist an Army appropriation bill. Indeed, the Senator from Ohio, representing the Committee on Finance, will not stand up here to resist an Army appropriation in time of peace or at any time.

Mr. President, in relation to what my friend has said about our treating with the Indians, I wish to say that that has been the uniform practice of the Government from the beginning and from before the beginning. The colonies treated with the Indians. The colonies were weak; the Indians were strong. The colonies were glad to treat with them; they were regarded then as to the colonies as independent and hostile powers such as the colonies were content to live upon terms of peace and amity with, and they made their treaties. I believe that if we kept our treaties now in all respects as faithfully with the Indians as the Indians keep their treaties with us, we should have little complaint. I believe that the difficulty has been more on our part; and that the breach of treaties, the breach of faith is as much to be attached to the Government of the United States as those who act in its name, and indeed more than to the Indians themselves.

But, Mr. President, I have taken up more time than I intended.

Mr. POMEROY. I rise to say but a single word. While I have not much confidence in the making of these treaties; I yet believe that the Indian department, so far as the transportation of supplies is concerned, has as economical and as regular a system as the War Department. The Senator from Ohio intimated very clearly that this was inaugurating a new system of transportation. It is not so at all. The Indian department advertises every year, as regularly as the War Department, for transporting all their goods, so much per hundred pounds per mile; and it happens that their bids this year, and I do not know but that it is so every year, were a little lower than those of the War Department. It is as economical a system of transportation as any in the War Department or any other Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if those contracts will cover subsistence like this.

Mr. POMEROY. Precisely. All their transportation is included in their advertisement, and those who get the contract will have to carry these goods with any others the department desire to send, because they have entered into contracts to do all the transportation of the department at so much per hundred pounds per mile, the same as is done in the War Department, only that the price is a few cents less. Then so far as relates to transportation there can be no objection to having the Indian department do it.

But, sir, I confess that I have very little faith in the system of treaty-making with these Indians. These Indians are very badly demoralized, and if you make a treaty with them it will not be really a treaty with the Indians but with a few white men who have got among them who want some goods and who use the Indians for their purposes. If there had been no white men mixed up among these Indians we should not have had half the trouble we have had. Bad men have gone out and got in with these tribes and demoralized them. The only result of arrangements of this kind is that they keep the peace while the goods last; the Indians will behave very well as long as they are fed. I have seen many treaties made, and I confess that I have but very little confidence in them. When the Indians are hungry again they will commit more depredations.

Mr. STEWART. I think there is no doubt that we shall have to make this appropriation, inasmuch as there is an agreement to collect these Indians and feed them, and the consequence of a failure to do so would be terrible to persons now on the plains exposed; but having lived for the last fifteen years in an Indian country, and having seen more or less of the practical operation of the present system, and having conversed with a large number of persons who have seen more than I have of it, I have no hesitation in saying that the whole system is an absolute failure. It simply involves the extermination of the Indians and the extermination of a very large number of white people. Peace lasts while your provisions last. When the provisions run out, in order to get more the Indians commence murdering, and before you have any notice of it whole neighborhoods are cut off, women and children are slaughtered, and war is inaugurated for the purpose of their being bought off. The Indians understand it perfectly well. They boast of it. They say if they do not get their presents they will do these things, and they will get their revenge. I have been acquainted with several chiefs who told me how they intended to manage, understanding it perfectly.

The whole system is wrong; it corrupts your agents; corrupts the men you send to the frontier; corrupts the Indians; causes a large number of persons to be murdered every year. It is a long distance off, and you hardly realize how many people are murdered on your frontiers yearly. Probably a great many more whites are killed in battle and murdered on the frontiers than Indians. Undoubtedly in all your Indian wars five white men are killed to one Indian. The Indians, however, are destroyed by whisky and by feeding them for a time to excess and by the habits and diseases that they acquire from the white people. Small-pox and other diseases are carried among them, and they are carried off in large numbers. Virtually you kill them in that way, and they murder your white people. That is the system that is going on. You murder them by the whisky you carry among them, and they retaliate by murdering your women and children. That is the system, and I do not think any system can be devised which is any worse than this. I think the Committee on Indian Affairs should bring in a plan for a change. If you turn it over to the military you will make it somewhat better, because then you will have a Department more responsible than any you can organize for this special purpose. I think it would be still better to turn them over to the new States and Territories, and let them take care of them. That would be better than the way you are doing, and more humane. The present plan is the most inhuman, the most degrading, and the most lamentable in all its consequences you can conceive of. You cannot make it any worse by any change. But now, inasmuch as there is an agreement made with these Indians—and if we do not carry it out on our part, there will be immediate and terrible consequence visited upon the innocent that are upon the plains under the impression that they are to be protected, and that there would be treaties made—we are bound to vote the appropriation.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day will now be resumed, having been informally laid aside by common consent, being Senate bill No. 220, for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

Mr. WILSON. We had up yesterday morning a motion to reconsider the vote on the Colorado bill. I desire to take that up and have the question taken on the reconsideration, if possible; this morning. I should like to have the other matter go over if the gentlemen who have the care of it will agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is before the Senate. Does the Senator make a motion to postpone it?

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. WILSON. I give notice that I will call up the motion to reconsider to-morrow morning.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole; the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. NYE to the amendment of Mr. GRIMES, to strike out "twelve" and to insert "fifteen" before "per cent."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon either of the amendments, or the bill itself, the Senate will indulge me with a word or two upon the merits of the proposition contained in the report. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] must have satisfied the Senate yesterday that some of the claims should not be allowed unless some explanation can be given in relation to the particular claims to which he called attention that is not to be found in this report. It is not necessary that I should call the attention of the Senate to the two cases to which he adverted, because he did it so clearly yesterday that it must be fresh in the minds of the Senators who were at that time present. The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] seemed to suppose—and that was the case with one or two other Senators—that what the Senate has already done and what has been done under the authority of the Senate's resolution exclude us from the right to inquire into the justice of these claims, that we are bound to allow everything that was allowed by the commissioners appointed under the authority of the resolution of the Senate. If I took the same view of that resolution as was taken by the Senator from Massachusetts, I should certainly vote accordingly; but I do not so understand the Senate resolution of March, 1865. The resolution is:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board, of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels-of-war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. None but those that have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

The whole authority communicated to the board by the resolution was to ascertain, first, what the contract price was, and second, to ascertain what in point of fact was the whole expenditure under the contract made by the contractors; but why the expense exceeding the original contract price was a matter not submitted to them. The Senate wished to know whether the expenditure exceeded the contract price as a fact, reserving to themselves the right to decide, if it should be ascertained that the amount did exceed the contract price, whether the difference should be made up by the Government, or how much of the difference should be made up by the Government; and either of these questions would necessarily involve a further inquiry not submitted to the board by the resolution, what were the reasons which induced an expenditure exceeding the contract price. The reasons suggested in the two cases referred to by my friend from New Hampshire yesterday, in the first place, were not submitted to the board to inquire into; and in the next place, if they had been submitted to the board, they would clearly have committed an error in supposing that they constituted any ground at all binding the Government to pay the difference between the contract price and the actual expenditure.

I feel, therefore, under no obligation to allow what was allowed by the board; and the question before the Senate is one to be decided under all the circumstances of the case. Is it right that these contractors should be allowed more than the contracts with the Government entitled them to demand? That they have no legal right, I suppose will be admitted, because, although as between the contractor and the Government any alteration in the vessels not stipulated for in the contract would bind the Government to pay the additional expense consequent upon the alteration, and perhaps would bind them to indemnify the contractor for any expense consequent upon the delay in the completion of the work because of the change of the model of the vessel or the engine, it is perfectly certain, as all these contracts provided that there might be a change, that as far as the law is concerned, as between the Government and the contractor, there would be no obligation to pay anything except for the extra work.

But we all know, and if we did not know it the facts stated in the report bring it before us very satisfactorily, that there must have been in some of these cases a loss where there was no failure at all on the part of the contractor. The work which these contractors undertook to perform was a novel one. As the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs told us the other day, no such vessels as those that we desired to obtain had ever been built before, or if ever built before they had never been built in the United States, and our mechanics were therefore in a great measure inexperienced in what would be the cost of vessels of this description, and the Government were equally inexperienced. It was impossible, therefore, that they should be able to make any exact, accurate estimate, as they are able to do in relation to work the nature of which is fully comprehended. They went on therefore from time to time to change very materially the model not only of the hulls of these vessels, but of the engines, until they succeeded in obtaining, as I believe they have, vessels equal if not superior to any to be found elsewhere, and they rendered us very material service during the late civil war. That service was not only the service of putting it in our power to terminate the war perhaps sooner than otherwise it could have been terminated, but it was in placing us before the world as a maritime Power of the very first rank, and that fact alone gives a pledge I think of safety so far as foreign wars are concerned. Nothing but absolute necessity, a necessity growing out of some imputation on the honor of other Governments, or some gross violation on our part of what is due to the other nations of the world, would induce them to engage in a war with the United States; and as I do not apprehend that any such wrong will be done on the part of this Government, I feel sure that none of the nations of the world will ever engage in war with the United States if they can honorably avoid it; and that security has been accomplished in a great measure by the success of these vessels.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a statement of the reasons which in a particular case led to an expenditure much exceeding the amount of the contract price; it is upon the part of the contractors in the city of Baltimore who built the machinery for the Mackinaw, machinery, as I understand, that has turned out to be as perfect, and a great many think more perfect, than any machinery that has been built elsewhere for any of these vessels. They were engaged in very profitable business at the time they entered into this contract; they were solicited to enter into the contract by the Navy Department; the works of the Navy could not supply the immediate demands of the service, and all the other works, private as well as public, were oppressed by the urgency of the demand, and these gentlemen were applied to to build this machinery. Their statement is this—and the Senate I am sure will credit their statement, because two more honorable men are not to be found anywhere. The parties to whom I allude are Poole & Hunt, who built the machinery for the United States double-ender Mackinaw. They say:

1. Poole & Hunt accepted this contract at the solicitation of the Navy Department, at a time when the navy-yards and private marine engine building establishments of the country were found to be inadequate to meet the exigencies of the public service.

2. No specifications or drawings had been prepared by the Navy Department, for want of time. The price to be paid for the machinery, namely, $82,000, was fixed by the Department, and Poole & Hunt assured by said Department that the price thus fixed would be ample, and the case of the Paul Jones, then but recently completed, was cited as proof.

3. The specifications subsequently furnished to Poole & Hunt by the Navy Department required in their fulfillment much heavier and consequently more expensive machinery than Poole & Hunt had supposed from the representations of the Department that they would be required to furnish.

4. The cost of the machinery to Poole & Hunt was greater than to some other contractors, for the reasons, first, that they were not regularly engaged in marine engine building, and had to expend sums in rental of wharf property, erection of shears for hoisting, &c.; and secondly, that the hull of the vessel, which was built at one of the Government navy-yards, was not delivered to Poole & Hunt for months after the appointed time, during which time materials and labor had advanced in price far beyond all anticipations.

5. Poole & Hunt during a period of great public necessity devoted their workshops to the construction of this machinery, to the exclusion of other orders from private parties, upon which a fair business profit could have been made, and in estimating the cost make no charge for their own services, but include only the items of expense directly and justly chargeable to this work, and which determine the actual and positive loss.

6. Poole & Hunt do not ask to be paid a profit upon the cost of the machinery, but having faithfully supplied said machinery, at the positive loss as set forth in the report of the naval commission, and having had from the Navy Department no other orders upon which a profit could be made to offset the loss made upon the contract in question, only claim to have said actual loss reimbursed to them.

The actual loss as made to appear to the satisfaction of the board I think was between forty-two and forty-three thousand dollars.

As I have said, Mr. President, there is no legal claim perhaps to make this demand; but it seems to me very clear that in relation to contractors having a claim under the facts stated by these particular claimants, it is but right that they should at least receive some indemnity; and under all the circumstances perhaps it would be a fair settlement of the whole concern to give them a certain percentage above the amount of the contract price. I should prefer the percentage of fifteen per cent., but if the Senate are unwilling to give the fifteen per cent., of course I would vote for the proposed percentage of twelve per cent. I could not vote for the whole amount proposed to be given by the committee of this body, not only because it is perfectly evident that in some cases there is no claim for any amount, but secondly, because in a case of this description it is fair that where there is a mutual mistake there should be a compromise; and a compromise, as I think, can be made so as to do something like justice to both parties by giving twelve or fifteen per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that a decided majority of this body believe that some relief ought to be given to these parties; but exactly upon what terms and in what way the friends of the relief are not fully agreed. I think that an understanding can be arrived at which will be satisfactory to all the Senators who believe that something ought to be given. With a view to that I move that the bill be continued as a special order until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO GENERAL HANCOCK.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up the joint resolution, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, of thanks to General Hancock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield S. Hancock. The resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, &c., That, in addition to the thanks heretofore voted by joint resolution, approved January 28, 1865, to Major General George G. Meade, Major General Oliver O. Howard, and to the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac, for the skill and heroic valor which at Gettysburg repulsed, defeated, and drove back broken and dispirited the veteran army of the rebellion, the gratitude of the American people and the thanks of their representatives in Congress are likewise due, and are hereby tendered, to Major General Winfield S. Hancock, for his gallant, meritorious, and conspicuous share in that great and decisive victory.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON subsequently said: I thought that the resolution which the Senate has just passed, of thanks to General Hancock, stated on its face that it was unanimously resolved. It does not, and it will not appear that it was passed unanimously unless we amend it.

Mr. WILSON. By common consent it can be amended by inserting the word "unanimously." I do not know of any opposition to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to insert the word "unanimously."

Mr. WILSON. That will render it necessary to send the resolution back to the House.

Mr. CONNESS. That will not delay it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The Chair is informed that it is not usual to insert the word "unanimously" in a joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. It can appear on our Journal that it passed unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will appear on the Journal that it was passed unanimously by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

SOLDIERS' NATIONAL ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON. There are two or three other small matters reported from the Committee on Military Affairs that I desire to dispose of. I move to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to appoint the following persons managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, under the provisions and conditions of the third section of the act approved March 23, 1866: Richard J. Oglesby of Illinois, Benjamin F. Butler of Massachusetts, and Frederick Smyth of New Hampshire, of the first class, to serve six years; Lewis B. Gunckel of Ohio, Jay Cooke of Pennsylvania, and P. Joseph Osterhaus of Missouri, of the second class, to serve four years; John H. Martindale of New York, Horatio G. Stebbins of California, and George H. Walker of Wisconsin, of the third class, to serve two years.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the Senate joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) appointing a board of managers for the National Military Asylum, which has been reported upon adversely by the Committee on Military Affairs, with a view to move its indefinite postponement in order to get it off the Calendar.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REV. HARRISON HEERMANCE.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up House joint resolution No. 107.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers. It requires the Paymaster General of the Army to adjust and pay the account of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment of New York volunteers, for such period as it shall appear that he actually rendered service as chaplain of the regiment, and for which he received no pay by reason of defective muster, or otherwise, through no fault of his own.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the report read.

Mr. WILSON. This resolution came from the House of Representatives. There is no report accompanying it, but the facts are these: this gentleman was appointed chaplain of a regiment, and went out and served with it three or four months, and has never received any compensation for his services. It is stated by those who are conversant with the case, among others a member of the House of Representatives who served in the Army, that this gentleman was a most excellent man, performed good service, and everything in the case is supposed to be correct.

Mr. GRIMES. Why do you not make a report, so that we may have it upon record?

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there no report from the House?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; but I have stated the facts. It appears that this gentleman was appointed by the Governor of New York chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment of New York volunteers, went into the field, and served for nearly four months; but when the time came for him to receive his pay, notice was given by the War Department that by the strict letter of the law he was not entitled to pay because he had not been recommended, before the appointment had been made, by the officers of the regiment, although those officers and everybody concerned, as I understand, were satisfied with his appointment. General Ketcham, of New York, who knows the man, the regiment, and the case, says it is a most meritorious case.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection to the passage of the bill that I know of, but I must protest against this rule of calling upon the Senate to pass upon bills of this kind without any written report. Up to the last four years, such a thing as asking the Senate to pass a bill under such circumstances as these was never heard of. I trust, if the Committee on Military Affairs are going to take jurisdiction of private claims of this description, that they will at least furnish us a record of them so that we may know from session to session upon what principle we are acting.

Mr. WILSON. If any member of the Senate desires to have the matter go over, I have no objection. The bill came to us from the House of Representatives without a report, but I am willing to recommit it to the committee in order to have a written report made on the subject. I have stated the facts of the case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move to postpone the pending and all prior orders with a view to take up the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to recommit this bill for the purpose of having a written report made?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I move to recommit the bill for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 280, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done. There is a bill that has been partly considered, of a very important character, that ought to be passed. I get letters about it every day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can assure the Senator that this bill will take but a short time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill to which I refer is the one in relation to the habeas corpus. It is a bill to protect Union men in the South, and I think it ought to be acted upon. I imagine every member of the Senate would be willing to vote for it in some form.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that I have been requested to call up this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose it is of any importance to pass this appropriation bill now.

Mr. SHERMAN. We desire to hurry on their engrossment. We wish to put the appropriation bills forward.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a bill to make appropriations for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Finance requested me to call it up. It will occupy but a few moments. I apprehend it will only take the time occupied in reading the bill. It is very short.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator persists in his motion I will not antagonize with him, but this other bill has been up, and I suppose it is of no sort of importance whether the Post Office appropriation bill passes now or a month hence; it will certainly pass at some time.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it, and as I have the floor I insist on my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will probably prevent our considering the other bill to-day.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section two, line five, after the word "appropriated," to strike out the words "to take effect so soon as Brazil shall have performed the condition on her part provided in the law authorizing said service," and at the end of line nine to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this appropriation shall take effect only when Brazil shall have performed the condition on her part provided in the law authorizing said service.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1867, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For the mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, $150,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall take effect only when Brazil shall have performed the condition on her part provided in the law authorizing said service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and is hereby, required to report to the Secretary of the Treasury annually, prior to the 1st day of November of each year, his estimate of the money required for the service of the Post Office Department for the ensuing fiscal year; which estimate shall be reported to Congress with the printed estimates of appropriations required by the joint resolution of the 7th of January, 1846.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to offer another amendment; to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the balance of the appropriation of $100,000 under the thirteenth section of the act "to establish a postal money-order system," approved May 17, 1864, which may remain unexpended at the conclusion of the current fiscal year, may be used, as far as necessary, to supply deficiencies in the proceeds of the money-order system during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1866.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer as an amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which persons have been appointed as assistant postmasters, either during the session or the recess of the Senate, and whose appointments have been submitted to the Senate and rejected or not consented to before the adjournment of the Senate, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury to pay the salary of such person, under such appointment, or under any previous appointment as such postmaster, after said adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Two or three of the Attorneys General—I forget who they were—and the President has acted upon it from time to time, have held that an appointment made during the recess continues up to the close of the next succeeding session, whether the nomination has been submitted to the Senate and rejected or not. This is the received opinion now of the Government, and has been acted upon from the days of General Washington, I believe, but certainly from the days of Mr. John Quincy Adams; but this amendment, if I understand it, holds a doctrine directly the reverse of that.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir. The salary may be paid until the adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment again. Perhaps I did not understand it.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will observe that the last words of the amendment are "after said adjournment;" that is, after the adjournment of the Senate. The Senator will see that it does not interfere with the payment up to the date of adjournment. I drew it in reference to that. I drew it in a great hurry. My intention was to permit the salary to be paid until the last day of the session, but, beyond that it is not to be paid. The amendment does not conflict with the opinions to which the Senator refers.

Mr. NESMITH. I will inquire of the Senator from Missouri, if it is contemplated by this amendment to prevent the payment of salary to a person if he should be reappointed after the Senate adjourns.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not. We have no control over that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the amendment will cover the case suggested by the Senator from Oregon, else it will be a useless provision. If the President the moment the Senate adjourns can reappoint whom he pleases when the vacancy has previously existed, and pay him, the confirmation of the Senate amounts to nothing, and the Senator's amendment amounts to nothing. I think it ought to embrace those cases.

While I am up, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri another amendment which I think is necessary. Some years ago, I think in 1863, a provision was inserted in an appropriation bill to prevent the payment of salaries to persons who were appointed as officers in cases where no such office existed, and also to prevent the payment to persons who were appointed to fill vacancies, which vacancies had existed while the Senate was in session and were not filled until after its close. That provision, I think, read something like the one which the Senator from Missouri has now introduced. It prohibited the drawing of any money from the Treasury, as I recollect it, to pay those officers. But the point to which I desire the attention of the Senator from Missouri is this: notwithstanding that provision of the law, the Government found no difficulty in paying the persons whom it undertook to make officers without authority of law, out of the departmental contingent funds. The money was not drawn for that purpose; it was drawn as a contingency, to pay the contingent expenses of the Department, and was then taken to pay those persons, who were not officers at all; for the President of the United States has no more authority to make an officer, when the office is not established by the Constitution or by law, than he has to make a king. I will call attention to that provision of the statute.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do you allude to the statute of 1863?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is on page 646 of the twelfth volume of the Statutes-at-Large. It was attached to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is the provision:

"That no money shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States to any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval, as salary in any office, which office is not authorized by some previously existing law, unless where such offices shall be subsequently sanctioned by law: nor shall any money be paid out of the Treasury as salary to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office, which vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and is by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee shall have been confirmed by the Senate."

Notwithstanding that statute, persons were paid out of the contingent fund, as we have learned in response to our resolutions of inquiry, introduced at the present session, I think, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] The different Departments admit that they have been paying officers—

Mr. SUMNER. In violation of law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They have done it, I think, out of the contingent fund. I believe their responses show that. I think it is a virtual violation of the law; it is a violation of the spirit of the act. But I would take away the subterfuge; I would provide in this section that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury for that purpose, and no money shall be paid out of any fund whatever to persons claiming to have an office when there is no such office. The Constitution of the United States authorizes the President of the United States to appoint all officers created by that instrument or which shall be established by law; but he cannot appoint to an office that is not established by law. Another clause of the Constitution directs that officers shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and still another clause that the President may make temporary appointments to offices in cases of vacancies which occur during the recess of the Senate, and the appointee shall hold his office until the close of the next session of the Senate. That is a valid appointment, and such an officer is authorized to be paid. But if the vacancy exist while the Senate is in session, it is the duty of the Executive to fill it, and he has no authority to fill it afterward. The Constitution of the United States vests him with no such power. It is only when a vacancy happens during the recess that he can fill it without the advice and consent of the Senate. If, then, a vacancy exists now or before the Senate adjourns, while it is in session, there is but one way under the Constitution of the United States to fill that office, and that is, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and if the President omits to make a nomination, or makes a nomination which is rejected by the Senate, the office must go vacant until the Senate shall meet and confirm the appointment.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator that we let this bill go over and have the amendment printed, in order to take up the habeas corpus bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is, perhaps, a matter of some importance, and I think, as my friend from Iowa suggests, that we had better let it go over and let the amendment be printed, so that we may consider it carefully. I think this amendment ought to be so worded that under no circumstances could the money of the people be taken to pay persons who are holding positions not provided for by law, or are holding them contrary to the Constitution and the law. I move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri be printed, in order that we may see exactly what it is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that course being taken, and I will add a slight amendment to the amendment as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the pending bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 248) for the relief of James G. Clarke.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 248) for the relief of James G. Clarke; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Alexander Thompson, late United States consul at Maranhau.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 238, in relation to the habeas corpus.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to add at the end of the first section the following:

But no such order shall be a defense to any suit or action for any act done or omitted to be done after the passage of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to amend the amendment reported by the committee by inserting in line eighteen, after the word "shall," the words "by force of this act or the act to which this is an amendment;" so that it will read:

But no such order shall, by force of this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, be a defense to any suit or action for any act done or omitted to be done after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLARK. I think there is no objection to that amendment; I believe, on the whole, that it is proper.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move, in section one, lines three and four, to strike out the words "or other trespasses or wrongs done or committed."

The object of this amendment is, not to diminish the scope of subjects upon which this section operates, but to take out from the section what is a manifest admission that certain trespasses and wrongs have been done and committed which Congress is asked to justify by a mere enactment or edict. For one, I do not admit that the searches, seizures, arrests, and imprisonments which we design to reach are either trespasses or wrongs; and it will be anomalous, it appears to me, in legislation to declare in a law which we pass, that we do justify, even if we have the power, anything which is a trespass or a wrong, an act for which a citizen is entitled, by all the principles of law, to redress. Therefore, my design is that these obnoxious words, to me, may be stricken out, so that the section will read: "that any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, or any acts done or omitted," &c., without giving character to the act. Let the law decide that.

Mr. HOWARD. I see the object of the Senator from Vermont, but it occurs to me that we should retain the words "trespasses or wrongs." The language of the section applies it only to cases of search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment; that is to say, that will be the application if the amendment is carried. It seems to me I would not narrow it down to that particular description of acts. There may be some acts performed which are neither searches, seizures, arrests, nor imprisonments, which ought, to come within the purview of the act. I therefore venture to suggest to the honorable Senator that he modify his amendment so as to insert the word "alleged" before "trespasses;" so that the section would read, "or other alleged trespasses or wrongs done or committed." Will not that meet the idea which the Senator entertains?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears to me that the terms following the words "imprisonment made," which are, "or any acts done or omitted to be done during the said rebellion," &c., are as broad as language can possibly be made. They are words of the most general character; and therefore my friend from Michigan is mistaken when he supposes that this section will be confined to searches, seizures, arrests, and imprisonments, merely; because then, with the amendment, the bill proceeds to declare in the broadest possible terms, "any acts done or omitted to be done during the said rebellion." If we desire by language which is perfectly supreme in its scope to cover every species of act which may be done, I am sure no more chosen or fit language could possibly be adopted; and therefore it appears to me for the sake of good taste, as well as for the sake of consistency, we ought not to begin an enactment in this Congress by declaring that we justify by a mere edict anybody's trespasses or anybody's wrongs.

Mr. CLARK. I think this is mainly a question about the construction of the bill, or rather a question of verbiage more than anything else, and I am not certain that the amendment of the Senator would not be an improvement in the expression. I certainly have no objection to the adoption of the amendment, for I think the Senator from Michigan will agree that the words following "or any acts done or omitted to be done" will include everything that could be done by anybody; so that if the Senator from Vermont has any choice about it, I am entirely willing that the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same reasoning would strike out all the other words, and you might just as well leave out the words "search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made," and let the section read:

That any acts done or omitted to be done during the said rebellion by any officer or person, &c.

But I will state that this section is copied after a statute already in existence passed some years ago, and although the general terms might embrace all these things, I think it is safer to leave these words in. They are in the former act.

Mr. CLARK. They are in the former act, but they are not in the sections which are alluded to in this bill. They are in the following section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. These are the very words, as I recollect, of the former act.

Mr. CLARK. They are the very words of the former act, but not in this sense or context. They are in the section following, the seventh section. I think the Senator will find it on page 755 or 756 of the twelfth volume of the Statutes. They are in the main immaterial.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The fifth section of the act of 1863 provides:

"That if any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced in any State court against any officer, civil or military, or against any other person, for any arrest or imprisonment made, or other trespasses or wrongs done or committed, or any act omitted to be done—"

Mr. CLARK. This follows the language of that section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir—

"at any time during the present rebellion, by virtue or under color of any authority derived from or exercised by or under the President," &c.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think the amendment is material.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think myself that it is very material whether the words are out or in. I suppose you might leave all the words I have suggested out, and I do not know but it would receive the same construction; but there might be a difference of opinion about that. Some courts might hold that the general language "any act done or omitted to be done" would have one construction, and some another. The object of the law certainly should be to protect our officers who, acting in obedience to military authority, committed any trespasses or wrongs of any kind or made any seizures or imprisoned anybody when in the discharge of their duties in obedience to orders for the suppression of the late rebellion. I should myself be quite as well satisfied to let the section remain just as it is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I respectfully suggest to the chairman of the committee the substitution of the words "or any injury to property or person." Will not that answer every purpose and avoid the objection made by the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. CLARK. That would be about as bad, would it not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The previous act, in which this same language has been used, uses it in an entirely different connection. The words are there used in respect to the removal of causes from the State courts to the Federal courts, and in such an act it may be perfectly proper to characterize the subject of any action as a trespass or a wrong, because if the Federal officer has committed a trespass or a wrong for which he may be civilly responsible, it is perfectly appropriate that the national tribunals should adjust the differences between himself and the person whom he has injured; and hence the old act appropriately enough uses this term. Here we are called upon, in this first section, not to provide for the removal of causes of action for trespasses or wrongs, but to provide by a mere enactment a defense ex post facto. Now, I should be sorry indeed—it is something more than a mere question of taste—I should be sorry indeed to set the first example, I think, in the history of legislation, of commencing an enactment by admitting that I had committed or my officer had committed a trespass which in the end I undertook to justify by an arbitrary law. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will consent to the erasure of those words, which certainly in my opinion will not weaken the just force of the section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to hear the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont read. I believe that is the amendment before us.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, line three, after the word "made," to strike out the words "or other trespasses or wrongs, done or committed;" so that the section will read:

That any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, or any acts done or omitted to be done during the said rebellion by any officer or person, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. There is a little amendment that should be made in the eleventh line of the first section. The words "done or" should be inserted after the word "so;" so that it will read, "or any acts were so done or omitted to be done." It is an omission in the printing of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I venture to suggest another amendment in the thirteenth line of the first section. The language as it now reads is this:

Or any acts were so done or omitted to be done, either by the person or officer to whom the order is addressed, or by any other person aiding or assisting him therein, shall be held, and are hereby declared, to come within the purview of the act to which this is amendatory.

I move to insert after the word "addressed" the words "or for whom it was intended." It may turn out in some cases that the order was misdirected by a mere clerical error, or the person for whom it was intended was misnamed in the orders innocently, and that he acted under the order nevertheless; but as the section is drawn, no person can avail himself of the protection of an order unless it should happen to be directed to him, although wrongly addressed by a clerical error. It seems to me this amendment will make it more exact and will enlarge the scope somewhat of the clause, and of the protection intended to be afforded. I propose to insert the words, "or for whom it was intended," leaving the matter of intention as a question of proof to be introduced upon the trial.

Mr. CLARK. It does not occur to me that there is any great objection to that. I do not now see any objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The word "is," the first word in the thirteenth line, should be changed to "was," so as to read "was addressed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. The act to which this is an amendment is only referred to in the title of this bill. I suggest to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire that there should be a direct reference to it in the body of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a reference to it in the first section.

Mr. HOWARD. The act to which this is an amendment is really referred to, if I mistake not, only in the title of the bill. I suggest that the title of that act should be inserted after the word "act" in the seventeenth line; so that it will read:

And within the purview of the fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863.

It is a mere matter of form, to give the bill more symmetry.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me it is hardly worth while to repeat the title of that act. The word "said" before the word "act" must refer to the act mentioned in the title of this bill, and nothing else. There is no other act referred to, and there cannot be a mistake about it.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose we do not adopt the title. The title is no part of the law.

Mr. CLARK. If we amend the title then we can change the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not insist upon the amendment. It is usual, after the recital of the act proposed to be amended in the title of a bill, to make it definite by inserting it in the body of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Michigan whether it would not be sufficient—it is not at all necessary, because it is stated in the preamble—to add after the word "act" in the seventeenth line the words "of March 3, 1863." That will make it certain.

Mr. HOWARD. That will do just as well, and I will accept that as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move further to amend the bill by adding at the end of the twentieth line of the first section the following words:

Or so far as it operates as a defense for any act done or omitted in any State represented in Congress during the rebellion, and in which, at the time and place of any such act or omission, martial law was not in force.

Mr. President, I am not one of that class of persons who are struck with constitutional paralysis on every occasion when some necessary law for the security of the public is about to be enacted; and therefore I am willing to go as far as any reasonable degree of patriotism, or even any reasonable degree of courage, will permit into the debatable land of constitutional doubt in passing acts of this kind, which are really designed for the security of men who have been acting under the orders of the Government in enforcing the laws; but it has appeared to me that there are limits beyond which it is not only unsafe, but unwise, for those who represent the people to go, even for the good end in view of reaching so noble a purpose as that of protecting the persons whom it is said have been sued in actions at law for carrying out the orders of the President of the United States, either directly or indirectly.

The act of 1863, to which this bill is an amendment, simply provided that the order of the President of the United States, or the order of any one acting under his authority, should stand as a defense against actions of this description. This bill goes further, and provides that not only the order of the President of the United States or of the Secretary of War, but the order of any military officer of the United States holding the command of the department, the district, or the place within which any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment was made, &c., shall stand as a defense in and of itself; so that in States of the Union which have never been in rebellion, in States of the Union where martial law has never been proclaimed, the act of a captain recruiting a company of volunteers is to be by an ex post facto law a complete defense to an action of trespass against him for false imprisonment, or for taking a horse, or whatever it may be. Certainly it must be an extreme necessity indeed which drives us to such legislation as that. It is the exercise, as it appears to me, in regions where martial law and rebellion have not prevailed at all, of a power which can nowhere be found in the Constitution, which can nowhere be raised by implication from any of its provisions, and which is contrary to the natural sense of justice which pervades every man's bosom.

I know that there is a precedent for this class of legislation. In the time of that king who was called, or rather miscalled, the first gentleman in Europe, and who was certainly the worst monarch, and whose fears of assassination and the overthrow of his Government were such as to drive him nearly crazy, a subservient Parliament passed an act somewhat similar to this, which declared that all arrests of people suspected of treason which had been made, or which might be made within a certain limited time, should be regarded as lawful, independent of the question of whether there was any ground of suspicion, and independent of the question what subject of his Britannic Majesty it was who should make the arrest. But, sir, I have yet to learn that any court in Great Britain ever upheld an act of that description. I believe that no decision can be found anywhere in any civilized community holding that an ex post facto enactment, declaring, by mere force of the law, that a past transaction should be guilty or guiltless, had any force at all except as it fortified martial law or operated upon districts where civil law was not in force. Therefore it has appeared to me, not, as I have said before, as one of those persons who are delighted to find constitutional objections to everything which is proposed in the disturbed state of the country, but rather as one of those who desire to use that noble instrument to its fullest extent, and not to abuse its powers, that it is unwise as well as illegal to pass a law of this description, which operates upon districts of the country where there has been perfect repose, and where the mantle of the civil law has been unfolded day by day in the courts of justice.

Now, if I correctly understand public law, (and I do not claim any great familiarity with it,) where martial law does prevail, the order of the commanding officer, the order of his subordinate traced down through to the smallest corporal that carries a musket, so that it emanates from headquarters, as all proper discipline makes orders emanate, is a defense, independent of enactments and independent of any special statute on the subject. There is no meaning which can be attached, in my judgment, to the term "martial law," except that it has the force of law; and therefore, if there were any sections of this country where martial law has prevailed and where these arrests and imprisonments and seizures have been made, whether right or wrong, so that they were made by authority of the superior commander, that very law itself furnishes the justification, and it needs no act of Congress to confirm it. At the same time I am willing, if it be thought that an act of Congress will make it stronger, to acquiesce in that opinion. But when you ask me to go a step further, and into regions where peace and repose have prevailed continually, and martial law has not existed, and where no foe has raised his banner anywhere, and to say that the order of the President of the United States, or the order of any other person professing to act under his authority, however remote, is to be held as a defense in a court of law, then I am compelled to disagree, because it invades what have always been considered the fundamental private rights of every member of organized society.

Where is the necessity of it? If any of these arrests and seizures and imprisonments were made in regions where civil law prevailed, and were rightfully made, can they not be defended? If they have been wrongly made, ought they to be defended by an enactment of this kind, after the fact, which, without inquiry into the circumstances of the wrong, blindly declares that the wrong shall not be redressed? I am sure not. Therefore it has appeared to me that every good end which this bill has in view—and I agree it has good ends in view—is reached by adopting the amendment which I have proposed.

The usual course, and in my judgment the right one, and the course which ought to be pursued even in those regions where rebellion and martial law have prevailed, and the one which will be most effectual for the protection of those persons who are sued, is a bill of indemnity rather than an edict of defense. Let us declare that the United States district attorney for every district where any of these suits is brought shall, upon proper affidavit and proof of the good faith of the officer, interpose in the name of the United States and take charge of the cause himself; and if any citizen has been wronged, let him have his damages, and let the public pay them; if any citizen has brought a false and vexatious suit, impose double or treble costs upon him as a penalty for bringing such a suit. That is a species of legislation which I am sure would commend itself to the country. But there can be certainly no justice in denying to a man who has been really wronged the privilege of trying his cause in the courts of his country upon the ground that some man who has been vexatiously, in his own opinion, injured, will turn around, and without authority and without right, bring an action which he ought not to sustain. Such legislation, as it appears to me, will reach a much more beneficent end, not only for the reputation of the country and for its peace and repose, but for the personal protection and the personal advantage of the class of persons whom we are all so desirous to protect.

Mr. COWAN. I have been very forcibly impressed with the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont; and I would hope that some heed be given to this subject. I am very well aware of the difficulty that we now have in dealing with this subject as it should be dealt with. I am very well aware of the difficulty there is in protecting an officer who acted in the conscientious discharge of his duties, while at the same time we protect the rights and liberties of the citizens who were the victims of those who abused their official position, often for the purpose of inflicting wrong, and for the purpose of gratifying private malice against their victims. It is therefore that I would fain hope that this bill will have the best consideration that the Senate can give it. That the loyal citizen should have no remedy and no redress against the tyranny and oppression of those who for the time were clothed with a little brief authority, is too monstrous to contemplate in a Government which professes, like ours, to be a Government of law. That the officer who, honestly, in the performance of his duty, executed the orders of his superior, should be subjected to actions and liable to damages in the civil courts, is equally to be deprecated by every good man. But the difficulty is to know where to draw the line. How to pass an act of oblivion by which those things which were proper to be done, and which were rightfully done, should pass away and be forgotten, is one question. It is another to take care that the citizen be shielded, even though he may have been unfortunate enough to live in a district pervaded by these troubles, and where his life and his property, perhaps, were in jeopardy from those who were either ignorant of their proper duties, or who, in disregard of them, were disposed to violate them maliciously.

Mr. President, the boast of the American citizen, and his pride heretofore, has been that this was a Government of law, rather than that of any individual or aggregate number of rulers; and it was supposed that we had so perfected the system that nothing could be done lawfully without law; or, in other words, that nothing could be done in this country, either in peace or war, which was not warranted by the laws of the land. I am very free to confess that I was one of those who so believed. I supposed that war had its laws as well as peace. I supposed that the officer of the Army was as much bound by the law as the civil officer, the captain as much as the magistrate, the colonel as much as the judge, and the general as much as the Governor. I had supposed that in time of war that part of the law of nations which treats of war and which provides for war would be the guide of the soldier, as the municipal law in time of peace is the guide of the civil magistrate. But, sir, I am very well aware that in a proud and fierce democracy such as ours, it is perhaps impossible, in times of great commotion, of great excitement, and of civil dissensions, that this line should be exactly observed or that these rules should be well known to those to whom we intrust the protection of the public interests. Still, at the same time, with all due regard to the responsibilities which attach to these men, and with all proper consideration for the situations in which they find themselves, it must be confessed that after all the highest duty is the protection of the citizen, and especially the loyal citizen, and I would say especially the loyal citizen in the rebellious district.

Sir, there is small merit in playing loyal in New Hampshire. There is very little merit in being loyal in Pennsylvania. Any man can be loyal when the popular sentiment is so loyal that it would threaten him with a lamp-post if he were disloyal. But the stern virtue and the stubborn fidelity to the laws and to the Constitution, which marks the loyal man in a rebellious community, is above all others that which should be protected. It is for those men that I would now speak. It is for those men that I would now vindicate the justice of the Government. It is for those men that I would now vindicate the justice of the American people. I say that where a loyal man in a rebellious district has been maltreated by an officer of the United States Army, or by any person in the service of the United States, such a man is above all others entitled to the protection of the United States Government.

Who can gainsay this? I know that the tendency in the minds of men is to generalize. It is much more easy to generalize than it is to particularize. It is much more easy to throw your drag-net around a community or a State than it is to pick out the individual criminals and punish them. It is much more easy for an officer in the execution of his duty, and especially one so delicate as that of putting down a rebellion has always been, to treat all the people, irrespective of the circumstances which surround them, as guilty, than it is properly to separate the one from the other and let his hand be felt as the circumstances require.

How are we to do this, Mr. President? Does this bill do this? Will this bill enable an officer of the United States, or one in its service who has wantonly, maliciously, and without any probable cause, invaded the rights of the citizen, the loyal citizen, to escape from the punishment which the laws ought to inflict in such cases? Does this bill do that thing? If it does, this Senate of the United States of America, the greatest Republic upon the earth, ought to be the last place where it should find favor. In the United States of America, where, above all other places upon the earth, an insult offered to the meanest citizen of the Republic is to be taken as an insult to the Republic itself, wrong and outrage are not to be sanctioned by the laws. At the same time I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am as much in favor of a law to protect the officer in the discharge of his duty, in the fair, honest, conscientious discharge of the obligations imposed upon him in putting down this rebellion; I would protect him as far as any man. Does this bill do so; and if it does so, does it protect him alone? I have not been concerned in the fabrication of this bill; but I have thought that it would be far better—and I throw this out for the suggestion of the committee who have brought the bill here—instead of a sweeping enactment of this kind to provide that no action should be maintained against any person for wrongs or injuries done under pretense of an authority from the United States in putting down the rebellion, unless the plaintiff should show certain things, which, as the usual rule, are not cast upon him as a burden. Where is the difficulty in requiring the plaintiff to prove that the person who committed the wrong and the outrage upon him did so without authority, that he did so wantonly and maliciously? If you do that, you do not alter the frame and the texture of your laws, you preserve their harmony, and you preserve what is more, the administration of justice pure; you throw the onus or burden of proof on the plaintiff. What is to prevent you from enacting that the plaintiff shall not maintain his action unless he shows that the person did the outrage, committed the wrong without having the public good in his eye rather than the gratification of his own personal malice against the individual wronged or the individual complaining? I suggest whether this would not be better; would it not be safer for everybody? Then you put the burden upon the plaintiff to show the gravamen of his charge, because if the person was really clothed with authority from the United States, then the old maxim with regard to officers that everything they do is presumed to be rightly done would be still preserved, and the plaintiff would have his remedy over and above that.

If a man clothed with authority commit an act of this kind, I think it is perfectly clear that it would be required on the part of anybody charging him with either misfeasance or malfeasance in office that it be shown. If on the other hand a person not clothed with this authority should commit these wrongs, let him be put upon the footing of other citizens; let him have no advantage, even though he pretended that he had authority.

Then, Mr. President, there is another suggestion that I have to make. Is this bill to extend everywhere, or is it to extend only to those portions of the Union where rebellion has prevailed? Or are we to establish the principle that when rebellion prevails in any portion of the United States, that of itself operates to create a dictatorship in the Executive? Is the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to be taken to mean that the Executive or his officers may arrest everybody, right or wrong? If that is to be the construction put upon it, it is a new construction, and one which has never prevailed. If when the writ of habeas corpus is suspended I am arrested and denied the privilege, I am not thereby debarred of my action for redress. The officer is still responsible, responsible not only for his malice, but for his blunders; and it behooves him, before he exercises this extraordinary power put in the hands of the magistrate under these circumstances, to know well upon whom he exercises it.

I know that an impression prevails in some places that when you suspend the privilege of the habeas corpus, all people, innocent and guilty, without any difference or distinction, may be arrested and may be held until the supposed danger is over, without any remedy on the part of those innocently arrested. Mr. President, I take it, that is not the law, and if it were the law, no republic could long exist, because it is well known that the Chief Magistrate, the Executive of the nation, is the proper judge of the time and of the circumstances when it becomes necessary for him to exercise this extraordinary power, and I have only to refer to the cases of some South American republics where this very principle was made fatal and destructive to republican institutions altogether. If you give the Chief Magistrate of the Union the right to decide when the contingency happens, and upon whom he shall exercise this extraordinary power, then free institutions are at an end, then a rebellion, which of itself is not dangerous, will be a pre-text of a very great danger to you, sir.

Mr. President, I would be glad to see this bill so well considered as that no innocent man should be deprived of his remedy, and I would be glad to have it so well considered, too, that no officer or other person in the service of the United States, honestly in the discharge of his duty, should be liable to be harassed in the State courts and mulcted in damages for an honest and fair performance of his duty, and in my judgment that can be only attained by the rule which I have laid down. Put the plaintiff to make out his case; put the plaintiff to show that the defendant acted without orders, if you please; put the plaintiff to show that the defendant, if he had orders, executed them in a wanton, malicious, and injurious, and if you please unnecessary manner as it regards him; put the plaintiff to show that with or without orders the act of the defendant was not justified either by the municipal law or by the laws of war.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that not all there is here? Would not any officer be liable still, notwithstanding this bill, for an excess of authority just as a sheriff or anybody else would? This is only a protection for a man who does an act under and by virtue of an order. That is the extent of this bill; it goes so far and no further. For acts wantonly and maliciously done this bill would not protect him.

Mr. COWAN. Then, Mr. President, the bill is much more limited in its terms and the construction which the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee would put upon it than I have supposed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit to the Senator to read it himself, and I ask him as a lawyer whether he would put any other construction upon it. It professes to protect persons for acts done "under and by virtue of any order, written or verbal, general or special," issued by proper officers. Now, I ask him as a lawyer and as a Senator if he would hold that that protected a man for doing anything he might do, whether the order covered it or not. I apprehend no court would give it such a construction, and I submit to the candor of the Senator himself if in arguing it it is fair to assume that it is obnoxious to the objection that he makes.

Mr. COWAN. I perhaps might agree that if the order was specific and to be strictly construed, then there would be no mischief here, but if so there would be no remedy here. If you propose only to protect the officer or the soldier where he can cover himself with a literal order to do the act that he has done, then I am free to say that your act of oblivion will go for nothing. Large allowance must be made in the construction of these orders. The order is to do a particular thing. Well, as to that particular thing, nobody will be complained of. The order is to take the Senate Chamber; but the order will not warrant the slaughter of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire after he has surrendered. But is not the intention of this bill to cover that by the "order?" Is it not intended to say that when the Senate is taken and when the soldiery are excited and when blood is hot, this is under the order? If it is not, what is it? My objection to it is that it reverses the usual order. For an outrage done to the Senator from New Hampshire under circumstances of that kind, I would require him to show that the outrage committed upon him was wanton and malicious and unnecessary in the execution of the order. Is not that the usual course of courts? The plaintiff must make out his case; the burden of it rests on him, and he is required to make it out, and to make out a complete case, even if the defendant himself be not present and defending. Clearly that is the case where men sue for torts. The prisoner in criminal prosecutions was not allowed to make any defense in ancient times, and why? Because the King was bound to make out a case of guilt to the exclusion of every other hypothesis, or in other words to render unnecessary or impossible any defense.

I think that is a clear, distinct, and plain principle of the law, and I think it would afford a far better protection to United States officers than simply to declare that they shall not be liable for certain acts done.

And, Mr. President, apart from this bill is not the law so at any rate? Is not the law of the country to-day that whoever complains of the act of an officer of the United States must show either that he had no authority, or that he transcended his authority, or that the act that he did was not warranted by any law, municipal or international? Is not that the law to-day? What is this bill for? Is not the very object of this bill to relieve against the law? Is it not to cover, shield, and protect men who have violated the law? Is it not for the purpose of enabling a man to go into court who has no lawful defense, and to make one? Then the question arises, how is that best to be done? Is the defendant to make the defense, or is the plaintiff to make the case? If the plaintiff sues the officer in a particular character, if he alleges that the wrong was done under color of some special authority, is he not either to show that that authority itself is unlawful or that the defendant transcended it while he pretended to be acting under it? I say it is a matter of grave consideration for us, and that we ought not in this especial juncture to be hasty about this; that we conceive of some plan by which the officer or the soldier as well as the citizen may be protected.

Mr. President, I am very certain that outside of the defined limits of the rebellion, as we defined them, that which I have stated is the law of the land. Within the limits of the rebellion and where martial law might be lawfully declared, I am not so certain. Martial law, as I understand it, is the will of the commander, in the absence of any other law. Martial law exists in the paramount necessity of the case; or in other words, it is that case where the commander is obliged to administer what in one sense may be said to be martial law, but in another is simply his own will, because there is no law and no other means of administering any other law in the premises. It arises where leges silent inter arma. Where the courts are open, where the laws may be administered, the will of the commander cannot be substituted in the room and stead of that law, and his machinery for the execution of his arbitrary will can in no case supersede the proper tribunals of the country. To allow that for an instant is to allow that we are the victims of a tyranny against which the world has struggled during the historic era. There is not a page of our history—I mean the history of Englishmen and the history of Americans—that is not pregnant with lessons for our instruction upon this very point.

The law, as I said before, is supreme; the will of the whole people embodied in the Constitution or the statutes is what we obey. Who obeys any other sovereign? Do you, sir? Do I? Is any Senator here willing to take the will of one man, or a dozen men, and put it in the place of the American people, and dignify it with the name of law of any kind? If so, such man or such a Senator is unworthy of a place upon this floor and is unworthy of the name of American citizen. This is a Government of law, and not of men, and therein is its great characteristic; and it is prescribed law, published law, law that men may read and know, law the penalties of which cannot be incurred while it is locked up in the brain of a tyrant, or when it is posted upon the top of high posts where the people cannot read it, as Caligula prescribed his laws.

Then, I say, where the law is in force, where the will of the American people is the rule of men's action, where the American people by their Congress have not displaced that law and subjected themselves to the will of a military commander, there this bill can have no place. At the same time, sir, as I said before, where they have declared the inhabitants of a certain definite, limited, bounded district in rebellion, and where that district is under the arbitrary will of the commander, which is martial law, there, and there only, is an act of oblivion or indemnity such as this is at all to be entertained for one moment. That changes the presumptions; that is all. When a district was declared by Congress to be in a state of rebellion, and our officers were sent there to suppress that rebellion, the presumption is in their favor that they did that which was right and proper to suppress the rebellion; if they did not, it is for the plaintiff who undertakes to arraign them at the bar of the civil tribunal after the suppression of the rebellion to show it.

But it is not for this Congress, nor for any other Congress, to declare by one sweeping act that nothing done in the suppression of the rebellion under authority and by virtue of orders shall give to any person injured an action for damages on account of it. That is a very different thing. Require your plaintiff to make his case; but do not undertake by one great act of—I hardly know what to call it; I will say dispensation, because it is to say that the laws which are the sovereign, and which we all admit we are willing to obey, shall for this turn, pro hac vice, have no place, that for a given time the people of this country, owing to the rebellion, shall be taken to have had no law. That, I think, Mr. President, we are not prepared now to do. I hope we are not prepared to do it. I would the rather suppose that in the restoration which we contemplate, and in bringing back the country to its old harmony and fraternal relations, it would be well to preserve as near as possible all of our laws and all of the spirit of those laws under which we have succeeded for about three quarters of a century as well as it was possible, and that we should not introduce into our code and make part of our system anything which was not consistent with it and which was not based upon the fundamental principles which have heretofore characterized that law and given it its high character among us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CLARK. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to by the Senate. The scope of it, I understand, is to limit the effect of the bill to those States in which martial law has been declared, or rather where the habeas corpus has been suspended and to leave these men who were commanded to do certain things in States where the habeas corpus has not been suspended, by their military superiors, to take their chances with a suit at law. The bill is in amendment of an act passed March 3, 1863, "relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," and the fourth section of that act provided:

"That any order of the President, or under his authority, made at any time during the existence of the present rebellion, shall be a defense in all courts to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, pending or to be commenced, for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment, made, done, or committed, or acts omitted to be done, under and by virtue of such order, or under color of any law of Congress; and such defense may be made by special plea, or under the general issue."

You will bear in mind, Mr. President, that this section provides that any order of the President or under his authority shall be a defense. In the course of this rebellion a great many things have been done by other officers than the President of the United States, and where you cannot trace the act directly back to the authority of the President; as, for instance, a general in command would order a certain thing to be done, and the officer under him, the inferior officer or the soldier, would go and do it; and so the act of March 3, 1863, was no protection either to the officer or the man under him who did the act, because he could not trace his authority back to the President. This bill goes on to provide further, that if these acts were done "by any officer or person under and by virtue of any order written or verbal"—it happens sometimes that the order was verbal, there was no written order, and it was difficult to be proved in this respect—"general or special, issued by the President or Secretary of War, or by any military officer of the United States holding the command of the department, district, or place within which such seizure, search, arrest, or imprisonment was made, done, or committed;" that order shall be a defense.

Now, it so happens, as the rebellion is passing away, as the rebel soldiers and officers are returning to their homes, that I may say thousands of suits are springing up all through the land, especially where the rebellion prevailed, against the loyal men of the country who endeavored to put the rebellion down. In one single State, and that a State which never seceded, I am told there are three thousand of these suits against the loyal men who attempted to put the rebellion down, and, strange to say, in that State some of the courts have declared that an order given by a Union officer to his subordinate was no defense, but if given by a rebel it was a defense, and the man set free. That is so.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is it proved? I should like to know.

Mr. CLARK. I have it from the member of Congress who was in the court when it was done.

Mr. JOHNSON. One of the superior courts?

Mr. CLARK. One of the courts of one of the States. I do not know whether it was the superior court, but it was one of the courts which had cognizance of the thing.

Mr. JOHNSON. A justice of the peace, perhaps.

Mr. CLARK. Not a justice of the peace, but somebody who had jurisdiction of the cause; and it becomes absolutely necessary that there should be some act to protect the men who have been fighting our battles for us and putting this rebellion down. How long ago was it that General Terry came here from Richmond in the pursuit of his ordinary business, and was prosecuted here in this District for something he had done somewhere in the department of Virginia? And so on through the land. No longer ago than last evening I read an account from a North Carolina paper that all through that State, since the rebellion has been subdued, and the rebels are returning, suits are springing up from one end to the other; and these rebel courts are ready to decide against your Union men and acquit the rebel soldier. If the Governor of one of those States had not interfered with his pardon, men would have gone to the State prison in that State for doing acts in pursuance of putting down the rebellion. And now the Senator from Vermont moves that this bill shall not apply to a loyal State, but shall be confined to States where the habeas corpus has been suspended. I must say I was surprised that the amendment should come from the Senator from Vermont; but I was not at all surprised that it should be indorsed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONNESS. That was as natural as could be.

Mr. CLARK. Perfectly natural.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not dishonor the paper, if it is good, on account of the poorness of the indorsement. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I would not, but I will say that if the Senator had been with us here during the rebellion, he would not have signed that paper.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that the honorable Senator may allow me to indorse that paper.

Mr. NYE. Will it improve it any? [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. I think it would. I am pretty well satisfied that if the Senator from Nevada had a good deal of his indorsed in the same way it would improve it. [Laughter.] But I have been in the habit of indorsing paper from the same State from which the honorable Senator [Mr. EDMUNDS] hails, and I am proud to see that the place of a Senator and a lawyer who formerly distinguished these Halls by his presence, (Mr. Collamer,) and with whom I had the honor to agree, I think, much oftener than the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, is filled by one who offers paper that can again be indorsed by me.

Mr. CLARK. I have no doubt in the world that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is glad to see a bit of paper of this kind from Vermont, it is so unusual; and I knew as well when it was offered that he would indorse it as I did after he put his name without recourse on the back of it.

Now, Mr. President, what is the reason why we undertake to shield these men in a case of this kind? First, because they are in pursuit of a worthy cause in putting down the rebellion; and secondly, because when a soldier is commanded to do a thing he cannot resist it. The soldier has the order of his superior to go and do so and so. What shall he say? "I will not do it, sir." Then he is court-martialed or put in the guard-house at once. He obeys; he cannot well do otherwise; and then because he is in a loyal State he is not to have the protection of the Government, forsooth!

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont was the author of the law of 1863.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that the old Senator from Vermont was the author of that law, and I did not know that the Senator from Pennsylvania indorsed it.

Mr. COWAN. I did indorse it; and if the Senator from New Hampshire does not know it, I can tell him that I myself was the author of some of its provisions.

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to hear him say so, for I have had it my mind, somehow or other, that the Senator from Pennsylvania had been changing around; now he has indorsed the contrary.

Mr. COWAN. A very intimate friend of mine was supposed at the time that bill was passed to be in some trouble in this particular direction; and I am not so certain whether the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, who is generally exceedingly captious and exceedingly tart, did not somewhat reflect on me at that time because I was constructing that bill in order to shield my friend; but we did not make it go beyond the order of the President or his authority at that time.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the benefit of that acknowledgment that he voted for the law to shield a friend. Has anybody else got a friend that wants to be shielded? These men were soldiers of a common country, and if the Senator from Pennsylvania will not shield them, the country should.

Now—and I am going to confine myself to this amendment—it is admitted that this is necessary in the rebel States, if you permit me to call them so, or in the seceded States. But suppose a case occurred in the State of New York. I think it was in 1863 when the riots occurred in the city of New York, and it was necessary to have a force there to maintain order. Suppose General Butler had said to one of his inferior officers, "You must do so and so," and he went and did it in pursuance of keeping the peace there and maintaining the authority of the Government, is not that man to be shielded? Suppose you follow it down from soldier to soldier, if you follow the order from one grade to another, so long as the man acts under the order, so long should he be protected.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Illinois, that if a man has an order of this kind and with that order in his possession he abuses the order and does what he is not required by the order, he cannot protect himself under the order. Does the Senator from Vermont think that he would be able to do so? If an officer by virtue of a writ should go and attempt to do certain things not commanded in the writ, and then should try to protect himself by the writ, it would be at once said, "You did what you need not do and what the writ did not command you to do." Suppose a man comes upon my ground; I put him off; and in putting him off, without any necessity I kick him and abuse him, and he sues me in court, and I plead that he was on my ground and that I put him off. "Ah! but," says he, "you not only put me off, but you kicked me;" then it would not defend me; there could be no pretense that it would defend me. So, if a man was commanded to go and take a horse and impress him into the Army, and he went and robbed a house, the order would not protect him; or if he went and stole a pig, the order would not protect him. It is what he is commanded to do by the order that the order protects him against; and it should protect him against that. He must follow the line of his orders or he cannot be protected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire mean to contend that an excess in degree in the execution of one of these orders, and not in kind, can be made the subject of an action under this statute?

Mr. CLARK. I suppose it would be in that case exactly as in other cases parallel to it, that if that excess in degree showed that the man was wreaking his vengeance and doing mischief instead of fairly following his order, it would not protect him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Leaving aside the question of motive, if there was in fact an excess in degree, what then?

Mr. CLARK. I suppose the question of motive must be left to the jury who try the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But suppose, leaving aside the question of motive, they find that in point of fact the act was in degree excessive.

Mr. CLARK. Who decides the question of motive?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose we leave that aside altogether, and find that in point of fact there is an excess in degree in the execution of the act to be done.

Mr. CLARK. That would be a question for the court entirely and the jury as to the excess, because if there was great excess you would infer from that a bad motive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose there was not great excess, but merely some excess?

Mr. CLARK. Then it seems to me if there was a little excess, and he did not intend it, and you lay the motive aside, it should protect him, and there is no great complaint of a thing of that kind; it is not worth complaining of; it is a distinction without a difference almost.

Mr. COWAN. That is minimis.

Mr. CLARK, (to Mr. COWAN.) I know, non curat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. COWAN. It was Latin.

Mr. CLARK. I do not understand that Latin is without the order of the Senate. What we desire is protection to these men in acts of this kind. We do not desire to shield anybody who has been guilty of doing what ought not to be done, or who has under such an order undertaken to wreak his vengeance or do mischief, but it is provided for the loyal men of the country who have been engaged in putting down this rebellion; and if in the great struggle that we have been obliged to make some men have done acts that were wrongful and we are obliged to excuse them to protect the great mass, we had better do it than let the servants of the Republic be tormented as they are in the courts.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me a word? I desire to suggest to the Senator that we are every day granting amnesty to rebels for the highest crimes known to the law. Who is against granting amnesty to some loyal men who have been fighting the battles? That is the suggestion I desire to make.

Mr. CLARK. It is a very pertinent suggestion. Those men, who have been pursuing our soldiers and murdering them everywhere they could find them almost, are coming here to the President of the United States, to those having power, and imploring pardon for all their acts.

Mr. CONNESS. And they get it.

Mr. CLARK. And they get it. But in regard to these Union soldiers who have come at your call, and marched under your orders, and preserved your Government, men cavil if even the Senate and House of Representatives propose to extend to them the hand of protection and protect them from the very men whom they have been fighting to save your Government from. Let me say, Mr. President, none but a rebel or a rebel sympathizer would sue one of these men who has thus been serving his country; but it more than anything now shows that the animus of this accused rebellion still lingers that we are unwilling to do this.

I know the Senator from Pennsylvania says it was a very easy thing to be a loyal man in New Hampshire. Then let me say to him that the disloyal men of New Hampshire, or Pennsylvania either, were without excuse, because there was not much difficulty about it.

Now, Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate, I appeal to the Senators to know whether if one of these men is to be protected in Kentucky, he shall not be protected in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Did we not have John Morgan in Indiana? Did we not have various disturbances in Illinois? Did we not have John Morgan in Ohio? And shall not the man who fought John Morgan in Ohio and Indiana and was obliged to seize a horse to follow him or seize a boat by order of his commander, be protected? Mr. President, the shield of my patriotism is broader, longer, every way larger; it covers these men wherever they are found who have been true to the Government.

The Senator from Pennsylvania would find out some different and some better mode of doing this; and that has always been the objection; when a measure has not been liked it has been asked, "Cannot you find some better way?" I do not know any better way than to go directly at it, say what we mean to do, and do it, and I do not care a copper whether the burden of proof is on the plaintiff or on the defendant, provided the defendant be protected, and protected by the strong arm of the Government. This bill comes to us from the House of Representatives. They framed it; they said it was the one they thought adapted to the purpose, and they sent it for our approval. The Committee on the Judiciary have taken the bill and examined it, and reported it back to you with one amendment and asked that it may be passed. Some verbal and other amendments have been made to it, which perfect the bill; and I ask now that this bill shall not go on one leg in the rebel States, and on a crutch in the loyal States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it has always appeared to me in the brief experience I have had in this world, that in the long run, passionate legislation, if I may so describe it, comes back to plague those who enact it, and it has generally happened in the history of civilized communities, that legislation which has been enacted under the influence of feeling, no matter how pure, under the influence of passion, no matter how complete and perfect might be the beauty of the object of it, returned futile and nugatory upon the heads of those who undertook to carry it through.

Now, sir, I do not yield to the Senator from New Hampshire in my devotion to the interests of the loyal men who have fought the battles of the country. Where I am known it would not be necessary for me to justify myself on such a point as that. I do not yield to any man in my desire, to use the language of my friend from New Hampshire, to protect the soldier who has fought the battles of the country, whether in Illinois, or Ohio, or Kentucky, or South Carolina. And it is because I desire to protect him that I am desirous that this bill should be put in such a shape that it will stand the searching investigation of a court of law. I do not think he can be accounted the true friend of the soldier who holds out to him the ashes of disappointment in a species of legislation which, while it looks well, will not bear the test of actual experiment. My way of protecting the soldier is to give him a protection which will be real, to hold up to him a security which is something more than a mere fulmination, and which shall answer to him with the certainty of a positive defense. How is that to be done? That is the question.

It is useless to waste our time in vague discussion about who is the best friend to the soldier, or whether the Senator from Vermont happens at this moment to be on the wrong side of the Senate Chamber. That is nothing to the question. The question is, how shall we reach the end which we all desire in the safest and in the most positive way? It happens that the Senator from New Hampshire thinks that the best way to do it is to go directly at it, as he says, and to declare by an act of Congress that an act which was guilty yesterday, which was a wrong yesterday, an invasion of private rights yesterday, is right to-day, and is therefore justified. That is all there is in this act. I am not speaking of those questions of excess which seem to have troubled some gentlemen;

I am speaking of the cases where an act which was wrongful in itself has been committed, and where, therefore, the person who was wronged has as much right to claim our protection as the person who wronged him, whether he acted under orders or whether he did not.

Now, I undertake to declare with the little knowledge which I have on subjects of this description, and to defy contradiction, that there is not an instance in the history of legislation which has been practically followed and justified in law, that went beyond simply this: providing an indemnity, as I said a little while ago, by way of securing to the party accused, whether in a criminal information or in a civil suit, for a wrong done, the benefit of an impartial trial in the courts of the country, as this bill very properly provides, providing that he shall be defended at the public expense, and if it happens that in the execution of his duty he has invaded private rights, let the public, for whose sake and at whose command he has invaded them, foot the bill. That is the way to defend a loyal soldier in my judgment, and I do not care to have my patriotism impugned because I think it the better way than it is to enact a nugatory law to protect him.

Mr. NYE. Can the public go to prison for him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They ought to go to prison for him.

Mr. NYE. They cannot very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he goes to prison, it is only as a consequence of the criminal procedure, which the public of course by a pardon can at any time dispense from. And it is open to a little doubt whether this act applies to criminal cases at all. It ought to apply to them. If it is a civil case, certainly the public can stand between the officer and all harm by paying the damages which the law declares in favor of the party whose private rights have been invaded.

There are two classes of people in this country to be looked at in this matter. There are the soldiers who must be protected, and there are the citizens who must be protected. They must both be protected in the exercise of their rights. It is the right, as it is the duty, of the soldier to obey the commands of his superior officer, and he must be protected in doing so. It is the right of the peaceable citizen in a loyal community where civil law prevails to be secure from search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment, except by due process of law or the judgment of his peers. One right is as sacred as the other, and therefore in our hasty zeal to protect one class of the community let us not do it at the expense of another who equally deserve protection, but let us so adjust our legislation by way of indemnity, rather than of arbitrary edict, as to provide for both.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not rise to detain the Senate on the question of this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator does not desire to go on to-night I will move an adjournment.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall occupy but a few minutes. The effect of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont will be to withdraw the protection afforded by this bill from all persons who have committed any of the acts contemplated by the bill in any State where martial law has not been proclaimed. I so understand the amendment of the honorable Senator, and if I misunderstand it I should be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of the amendment is this: in all States where martial law did not exist at the time of the supposed act, whatever it may have been, and in all States where there was no rebellion, this statute does not, in and for itself, operate as a defense, but it still allows, if my amendment be adopted, a transfer of the cause to the Federal courts, and to be defended there upon the same principles that any other act of a public officer would be.

Mr. HOWARD. Simply applying it, then, to the question of removal?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. President, I cannot vote for this amendment. I cannot by my vote turn over an innocent officer or soldier of the Union, who has done such acts as are contemplated by this bill, to the verdict of a local jury. That would be the consequence, if I understand it, of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. It would be to expose defendants in all such cases to the political prejudices and personal prejudices which might happen to exist in the particular locality against the person who happened to be a defendant.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Michigan will give away, I desire to suggest that this is a very important question; and I understand that it is desirable that there should be a short executive session. If the Senator will give way, I will move an executive session.

Mr. HOWARD. If I intended to make a speech of any length I would give way with great pleasure; but as I shall close soon, I hope the Senate will indulge me to the end.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is a very important question, and I should like to hear the Senator upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, what is meant by "martial law" in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont? What does it include? Is it the martial law that is to be established, or was established, by simple proclamation of the commander of the department or of the particular district? Is such a proclamation, even in a loyal State, the sole origin of martial law, and is it necessary in every case that there should be such a proclamation in order to justify the commander of the Union forces in the seizure of property that he might find absolutely necessary for the subsistence of his troops? Surely I did not suppose that the honorable Senator from Vermont would give such a narrow definition to the term "martial law." I do not understand it to be thus limited. Take the case of Illinois or of Ohio. Union troops have been marched and counter-marched through those States; actual hostilities have existed in those States; battles have been fought in Ohio and in Pennsylvania, neither of which was proclaimed to be under martial law, and fought in particular localities where there is no pretense that martial law had thus been proclaimed. I ask the honorable Senator from Vermont whether there be not the same necessity in such cases to extend this protection to Union officers and Union soldiers as there was in localities subject to the formal proclamations of martial law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Vermont says he does not think there is that necessity. There may not be that necessity to the same degree in reference to all those States. I probably should not dissent from the honorable Senator in that view of the question; but that there is some necessity, that that necessity is of sufficient magnitude to justify us in passing this act, I have no doubt. What was the case in South Carolina, for instance, during Sherman's famous march to the sea? Was there martial law in South Carolina proclaimed by the commander? I never heard of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was not represented in Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. But that makes no difference as to the principle. Now, sir, the great object of this bill is, in every case where a soldier or officer has acted in good faith under an order addressed to him or intended for him, to extend to him the protection of the law as against the consequences of any act which he might do and perform under that order or under color of that order, and to enable the defendant in such case as that to transfer the prosecution or the suit (for the proceeding may be criminal or it may be civil) from the local or State tribunal to a Federal tribunal, thus giving the defendant an opportunity of presenting his case to a court and a jury not infected by the local prejudices of the place where the act was committed.

I must confess that I see no ground or reason whatever for drawing the distinction that is drawn by this amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I see no reason why it should not be applied as well in loyal States in the case of acts by military officers or soldiers as to the same acts when performed in rebel States or in any State under martial law. The reason is the same in both cases, the great object being the protection of the soldier or the officer in the discharge of his duty, and that is a duty which I hold devolves upon Congress. A soldier or an officer who is a subordinate must not omit to obey the order. If he refuses to do so it is always at the peril of his life or of imprisonment; and to expose a person thus situated to the consequences which might flow from a suit or prosecution in a community where there were strong prejudices against him is something I imagine which we ought not to do. The bill is nothing, in my judgment, but simple, naked justice, applicable to one case as well as to another, and to one locality as well as another.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GRANT OF LANDS TO WISCONSIN.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of so much of the Portage and Superior railroad as extends from Fond du Lac to Ripon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, also presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, asking the assent of Congress in reference to the route of the land-grant railroad from Portage to Bayfield and thence to Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COMMANDER J. C. CARTER.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Commander J. C. Carter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GRANTS OF LANDS TO DAKOTA.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Yankton, in the Territory of Dakota, to the west line of the State of Minnesota; and

A bill to amend section two of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the several propositions were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES G. CLARKE.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I reported back, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Senate bill No. 248, for the relief of James G. Clarke. It was objected to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and went upon the Private Calendar. After having examined the claim, I understand that he withdraws his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman is somewhat mistaken in saying that I objected to the bill. I merely asked for the enforcement of the rule requiring bills making appropriations to go to the Committee of the Whole for their first consideration. While I do not object to taking the bill up, I do not say I will not object to its passage. Perhaps the bill is right in some aspects, but it is a bad precedent to pay a man for an office he never held.

Mr. PATTERSON moved that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to James G. Clarke the sum of $6,483 96, in full for services as acting chargé d'affaires of the United States at Brussels from June 11, 1857, to September 27, 1858.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a question of privilege.

Mr. MORRIS. I will yield if it will not take five minutes.

Mr. EGGLESTON. Day before yesterday one of the Representatives of West Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] made a statement in reference to a paragraph in a newspaper, attributing the authorship of that paragraph to a constituent of mine, Mr. H. V. N. Boynton. That gentleman, wishing to set the matter right before the House, has sent me the following letter, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17, 1866.

DEAR SIR: It appears from this morning's Globe that Hon. KELLIAN V. WHALEY caused a newspaper paragraph, out from the Cincinnati Gazette, to be read at the Clerk's desk yesterday, wrongfully intimating that Mr. WHALEY was not proficient in the elements of the Latin language; and that he then, in some very well chosen remarks, proceeded to denounce me by name as the writer of the paragraph.

I desire to state to you, as representing the district in which I reside, that the article did not originate, either directly or indirectly, with any one connected with the Gazette, but that it was a mere selection without heading or signature, which has been published in nearly all the—

Mr. JENCKES. I would inquire if the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] is in his seat.

A MEMBER. He is not here.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I ask that the reading of the communication be discontinued until he is present.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; go on.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to its further reading.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is no reflection upon the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It is all wrong.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is merely a disclaimer.

DISTRICT COURTS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. MORRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO. I ask leave to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 134) to regulate the terms of the United States courts in the eastern district of New York, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. MORRIS. Have I not the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] is entitled to the floor, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] objects.

Mr. MORRIS. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to be submitted. It is of a local character, pertaining to the courts of New York.

Mr. ANCONA. I do not object to the gentleman introducing his own proposition, but I do object to his yielding to friends on that side and not to those on this side.

Mr. BOYER. I renew the demand for the regular order of business.

Mr. MORRIS. I have troubled the House very little.

Mr. BOYER. I shall not withdraw it.

Mr. MORRIS. Much obliged.

ORGANIZATION OF THE PENSION OFFICE.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being House bill No. 278, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in amendment of the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute therefor.

The pending amendment was to strike out the second section of the substitute, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint, from the fourth-class clerks in the Pension Office, one chief examiner of Army invalid pension claims, one chief examiner of Army pension claims of widows, mothers, and orphans, and one chief examiner of Navy pension claims; each of said chief examiners shall be allowed $200 per annum in addition to the salaries already allowed to clerks of the fourth class: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to authorize the appointment of a larger number of fourth-class clerks than is now provided by law, including the examiners aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions shall be $4,000 per annum, and the salary of the chief clerk of the Pension Office shall be $2,500 per annum.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EGGLESTON.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. This bill as it now stands merely increases the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions from $3,000 to $4,000 per annum, and the salary of the chief clerk from $2,000 to $2,500. The question for us to decide is whether it is right and just that this increase for these two officers should be made.

I have given the subject some little attention, and the chairman of the committee stated to the House yesterday morning the relative salaries of other officers in similar situations in this city. I was fully convinced, after hearing that statement, that it was my duty to vote for this increase of salary, and I hope that my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who is always so watchful of the Treasury in this House, will not raise objection to the passage of this bill as it now stands.

I find on looking over the list of salaries that the Superintendent of the Coast Survey gets $6,000 per annum, the Comptroller of the Currency $5,000, the Treasurer of the United States $5,000, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue $4,000, and the Commissioner of Patents $4,500.

Now, I undertake to say that neither of the officers I have named have as many arduous duties to perform as has the Commissioner of Pensions. Every one acquainted with that department knows how well and faithfully that officer is daily attending to his duties. I have had some experience since I have been stopping in Washington as to the expenses here, and I am satisfied that $3,000 per annum will not meet those expenses, or come within a thousand dollars of it. I hope that in consideration of these facts each member will vote for this measure as it is just and proper.

Mr. PERHAM resumed the floor.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to move to amend the bill by striking out "$4,000" and inserting "$3,000."

Mr. PERHAM. I am unwilling to yield for an amendment of that kind.

Mr. ROSS. Then allow me to make a remark for a moment or two.

Mr. PERHAM. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment to make some remarks.

Mr. ROSS. I have quite a number of constituents in my district who are capable of filling any of these offices, and they are willing to take them at the salaries which we have heretofore been in the habit of paying.

Now, at the last session of Congress I voted for some increase of compensation to public officers. I did it for the reason that our currency was depreciated, and everything in the way of living was increased in price. But now the condition of the country is changed; the prices of articles are getting lower; our paper money is approximating more nearly to the value of coin; and I can see no necessity, in this juncture of our public affairs, when we take into consideration the condition of the people and the heavy burdens they have to bear, of our increasing the compensation of these officers.

Why, sir, I am astonished at the excuses which gentlemen make for increasing the compensation of these officers. They say that the Superintendent of the Coast Survey gets $6,000, and that the Comptroller of the Currency Bureau gets $5,000. Sir, as the Representatives of an oppressed and burdened people, are we, when we find out that an officer gets too high a compensation, to bring up the compensation of other officers to that standard? I should have supposed that my distinguished friend would rather have been disposed to cut down the compensation of all these officers instead of raising it. There is no necessity for an increase. You can get the best talent of the country to discharge the duties of these officers at the compensation heretofore paid by the Government, and it is placing unnecessary burdens upon our already over-taxed people to increase the compensation of officers now, when, instead of things rising in value, they are tumbling all the time.

It is much easier to get compensations up than it is to get them down. Gentlemen had better take notice of this. These salaries that were raised and that are now pointed to as the examples by which we are to govern ourselves, were increased for the reason that the currency of the country was inflated and the prices of living greatly enhanced in the city of Washington. Those reasons do not now exist, and instead of increasing, it is our duty to cut down and diminish expenses.

If you increase the salary of this gentleman to $4,000, you will have to increase the salaries of other officers in the same proportion. That is not our duty. Our duty is to commence cutting down instead of increasing; and I ask the members of the House to come to the rescue now and let us show that we are carrying out in good faith our pledges to our constituents to retrench the expenses of the Government and not increase them.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I understood the chairman of the committee to say, as a reason for increasing the compensation of the chief clerk, that this Commissioner of Pensions has not a deputy. I believe there is no department of a like kind in the Government where the head of the bureau has a deputy; and inasmuch as the proposition is to raise the salary of the chief clerk beyond the amount that is allowed to the chief clerks in other bureaus, I think that we should set a bad precedent, and one that would be appealed to hereafter in other Departments to the detriment of the public service, or at least to the loss of economy in the service.

I believe the highest amount paid directly for a chief clerk of any bureau in the Departments is $2,000 a year. If this chief clerk has not that salary now, I will vote most cheerfully to give it to him. And I would give him more than that, if that was not equal to the amount now given to the chief clerks of the different bureaus of the various Departments of the Government.

In regard to the other point, the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, I am bound in candor to say that I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. PERHAM] that this officer's labors and responsibilities are fully equal to those who are receiving the proposed amount of salary. While I admit that a man without a family may live here in this city upon the salary the Commissioner of Pensions now receives, and that good men, single men, may be obtained to take the position with that salary, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] I deny that the best talents and abilities of the country can be obtained for that amount of compensation.

Mr. ROSS. I will agree to furnish from my district good men at that salary.

Mr. KASSON. I fear that those men whom my friend from Illinois calls "good men" would not be regarded as those best fitted for the place by the people of the country.

We know that in point of fact this officer is a very able and a very faithful officer, and that the bureau, in years past, has never had more than one tenth of the business which it is now called upon to perform. Under these circumstances, I think, inasmuch as we have raised the salaries of some other officers, it is due to this one to raise his simply to a proper and corresponding amount, on no other ground whatever than that of just compensation for fitting and excellent services to the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa if the same reasons for increasing the salary of this Commissioner of Pensions do not apply to the heads of all the bureaus of the Government. Have not the duties of all the Auditors, for instance, been increased in very nearly the same proportion as the duties of the Commissioner of Pensions? And if you are going to undertake this thing, I ask, why stop here? Why not go further? Why not, as I said on yesterday, increase the salary of the Commissioner of Public Lands and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as well as the salaries of all the Auditors, who now receive this very salary of $3,000 a year?

And let me say here that this is the time to meet this question of raising the salaries of officers, for this is perhaps one of the strongest cases that can be presented. There is no objection whatever to Mr. Barrett. As I said yesterday, he is one of the ablest and most conscientious officers that we have. But that is no reason why we should impose additional taxes upon our constituents to pay him an increased salary.

Mr. KASSON. In order that I may answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN]—and I gave way for a question only, and not for a speech, for I heard this speech yesterday—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not all of it.

Mr. KASSON. I think I heard the whole of it. But before I forget the questions of the gentleman I will answer them. The salaries of the other officers should not be raised now, because Congress has, in point of fact, raised them in many instances already, to meet the present emergencies, and it would be unjust to raise them again. But the salary of this officer has been left below the grade of the salaries of officers of corresponding bureaus of the Departments. I know heads of bureaus who now receive from five hundred to one thousand dollars more than this officer receives who do not perform more than one half the duties he is called upon to perform.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then cut the salaries of the other officers down, and not raise the salary of this one.

Mr. KASSON. It is because it is just that the salary of this officer should be raised that the committee have reported in favor of raising it. If my friend from Illinois will introduce a bill to equalize the salaries of all these officers according to some just rule I will go with him in reducing those that are too high and raising those that are too low. But I am opposed to a wholesale denunciation of a just and proper compensation to a worthy and faithful officer on the ground that it is setting a bad precedent. From the beginning of this Government to this day we have from time to time felt compelled to raise the salaries of various officers of the Government according to the increase of their duties. And I do not know but that it may be so in the future. I am opposed to going too fast upon the subject of raising salaries. But I do believe it necessary to provide just and proper compensation to secure faithful and fitting service for the Government.

Mr. HALE. I desire to inquire whether the objection taken by the gentleman from Illinois to the increased expenditure proposed by this bill cannot be obviated to the satisfaction of all parties by making the money payable out of the contingent fund of the House. I believe that will remove all objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It might remove the objection of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] but it would not remove mine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I have finished.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERHAM. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has said, with some degree of truth, that I made substantially the same speech yesterday that I have made to-day. Sir, I believe that is the fact; for I have made that speech pretty often, and I am sorry to say with very little effect so far as regards my friend from Iowa. I have appealed more than once to members of the House to set their faces against all such extravagant propositions as this, but with very little effect. This case is presented to us fairly and squarely, and now let the House decide whether it will inaugurate this policy of raising salaries at a time when, as my colleague on the other side [Mr. ROSS] has very properly said, the prices of everything appear to be going down. When the prices of living are decreasing, and we are, as I trust, reaching the gold standard, why should we commence a system of increasing salaries? These salaries when increased will continue undiminished for all time. I have never known a case in which a salary has been diminished.

Mr. PERHAM. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I agree with both the gentlemen from Illinois that this is a bad time for the Congress of the United States to commence a system of raising salaries. But, sir, there may be, and I think there are, exceptions to this rule. The present salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, $3,000, was fixed in 1848, eighteen years ago; and it was fixed in accordance with the rule adopted at that time that the head of a bureau should receive half the salary of a Cabinet officer. The salary of the Secretaries at the time was $6,000; and hence the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions was fixed at $3,000.

In 1843 the Pension Bureau, as we all know, was a small institution. There were comparatively few persons upon the pension-roll. Now, that bureau has grown to an enormous extent; and the business of that bureau, I will venture to say, is more extended and important, and involves a larger amount of money, than the business of any other bureau of the Government. But the salary of the Commissioner, instead of being increased with the increase of business, has actually been diminished. How? We have provided in our laws that $2,400 of his salary of $3,000 shall be taxed at the rate of five per cent.; and to that extent the salary has been reduced below the amount at which it was fixed in 1848.

As was remarked yesterday by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. PERHAM,] a vast amount of money is involved in the transactions of the Pension Bureau; and the very best order of talent is required for the discharge of the duties of Commissioner. It is admitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that we have that kind of talent at the head of the bureau at this time. We wish to retain that order of talent. We wish that the duties of that position shall hereafter be administered with the same ability with which they are now performed. Hence the committee believe that the salary of the Commissioner should be increased from $3,000 to $4,000. The latter amount is $500 less than the present salary of the Commissioner of Patents; yet no gentleman acquainted with the facts will deny that the amount of labor required of the Commissioner of Pensions equals, and I believe that it largely exceeds, the amount of labor required of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] whether he is aware that the Government has found any difficulty in commanding at the present salaries the requisite talent for any of these positions, or whether he has heard that any of the heads of bureaus have resigned recently because they do not receive enough pay. If there are any of these positions vacant on account of such resignations, I give notice to the gentleman and to the country that there are several gentlemen in my district who would be glad to take these positions at the present salaries.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will say, in reply, that I presume there can be found in my friend's district gentlemen who are ready to take and occupy seats in Congress without any compensation. I will not say that they are equal in point of talent to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. STEVENS. I know some who are resigning in consequence of deficiency of salary. The Attorney General is about to lose the services of his assistant, a most valuable and efficient officer, because of the smallness of the pay. Unless some measure be passed we shall not be able to get along much longer.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was saying, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, when he drew a comparison between this Commissioner and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, there was no increase of business in the Indian Bureau. It has not increased for ten years, and for the next ten years is likely to decrease. It is the same with the Commissioner of Public Lands.

The gentleman from Iowa is slightly mistaken in supposing the salary of this chief clerk corresponds with that of other chief clerks. It is $200 less than that of other chief clerks. They generally receive $2,200. We make this $2,500 because of the increase of the duties devolved upon this clerk, and believe it to be right.

Mr. KASSON. Is not the gentleman in error that the chief clerks of the bureaus receive $2,200? The chief clerks of Departments receive $2,200, and the chief clerks of the bureaus $2,000. In the Post Office Department the chief clerks receive $2,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman is correct; some of the chief clerks of bureaus receive only $2,000. Some I know receive $2,200. The amount is not uniform. This asks for an increase to $2,500. The whole increase amounts to the sum of $1,500 a year. I think it is the duty of this House to pay competent officers adequate compensation, and that is all that is proposed here.

Mr. PERHAM. I hope I shall not be asked to yield any further.

I wish to say, in answer to the question why the committee have not reported in favor of the increase of the salaries of the heads of other bureaus, that in the first place, no such propositions were referred to us for other bureaus; and in the second place, there was no other bureau the business of which had increased to so great an extent as this. In most of the bureaus the business remains about the same as when the salaries were established. This has increased ten times what it was. This office has to make the disbursement of from fifteen to twenty million dollars in sums of $100 and less among individuals. It has to supply funds to agents all over the country and to see that the accounts rendered are correct.

Mr. CHANLER. Is this intended as a precedent for the increase of other salaries? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I understand, says the Attorney General will resign unless we increase salaries. I take that as an indication of general increase of salaries. There are a great many colored persons waiting to take these places, as well as your places here, and there is no need to buy these white men to stay. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERHAM. This was not intended to establish any such precedent. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The substitute was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PERHAM demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I demand the yeas and nays. I want the country to know who favor increase of salaries.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 63, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Bingham, Bland, Bunker, Butler, Clarke, Coffey, Davis, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Garfield, Grossberger, Haas, Hayes, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingalls, Jones, Kelley, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marvin, McKuer, Moren, Miller, Moorehead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Porham, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Bayard, Rollins, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Whaley, and Williams—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, DeLoe R. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownwell, Broome, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Deeming, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Good-year, Grider, Abner C. Thomas, Trimble, Warner, William B. Washburn, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—62.

So the bill was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, stated that Mr. BLAINE was detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. ANCONA stated that if his vote would change the result he would vote in the affirmative; as it was he voted "no."

The result having been announced as above recorded.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ANCONA. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on laying the motion to reconsider on the table, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 62, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Dodge, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Abner C. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Taber, Francis Thomas, Trimble, and Winfield—66.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PERHAM. Is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. The rejection of the bill will have to be reconsidered first.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it in order to withdraw the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It is not, after the House has refused to lay it on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the motion to reconsider prevails, will it then be in order to move to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 55, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Wilson, and Wright—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawson, DeFrees, Denison, Dumont, Eliot, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Laffin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Noell, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Warner, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—65.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, that motion is not in order.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with a resolution of the House of March 23, 1866, transmitting a statement of disbursements under the fifth section of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department in respect to the allowance of claims for the apprehension of Booth and others.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the convention of Texas in favor of a southern branch of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to refer it to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that it be printed and referred to the committee on reconstruction.

The question being put, there were—ayes 30, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. If it is in order to ask a question for information, I would inquire if this is to be referred to the committee on reconstruction with the view of having them reconstruct this railroad? Or what branch of the business of reconstruction does this proposition come under?

The SPEAKER. That is hardly a point for the Chair to decide.

Mr. ROSS. It is for the purpose of never getting a report, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANCONA. Is not the question first upon the motion to refer to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that motion to be made.

Mr. ROLLINS. I made that motion, as I supposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquired what disposition should be made of the paper. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] suggested in his seat that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] arose in his place and moved that it be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction. The House is now dividing upon that question, upon the last vote no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS. By whom is the paper signed?

The SPEAKER. By the president of the Texas convention.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing upon the motion to refer. If that motion shall be voted down the motion to lay on the table will be in order.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I desire to ask for information if it has not been the uniform custom of this House, from the commencement of this session to this day, to refer all such matters to the joint committee on reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. The order of the House is that all subjects relating to the representation of the so-called confederate States shall be referred to that committee. In regard to all other subjects the reference is to be decided by a vote of the House.

Mr. RAYMOND. Has the division of the House upon the motion to refer reached such a point as to prevent debate?

The SPEAKER. This debate has been tolerated by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAYMOND. Is the question of reference still debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent, as the House is now dividing, no quorum having voted on the last vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the question has not been fully understood. I would merely suggest—

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. Is debate or colloquy in order pending a division of the House upon a motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. Debate is not now in order. There was no quorum voting on the last vote, and the Chair will appoint tellers.

Messrs. WENTWORTH and BOYER were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes five, noes not counted.

So the motion to refer to the joint committee on reconstruction was not agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move to refer this paper to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

EMANCIPATION CELEBRATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House an invitation addressed to the members of the House of Representatives. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1866.

To the honorable members of the House of Representatives: We, the undersigned colored citizens of the District of Columbia, most respectfully invite the members of the House of Representatives to be present at the celebration of the anniversary of the emancipation of slavery in the District, to take place in Franklin square, Thursday, April 19, at twelve o'clock m.

ALFRED KIGER,
EDWARD L. SAYOY,
DANIEL G. MUSE,
W. H. SHORTER,
Committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think this should be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, [laughter,] and I make that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. Does the invitation include those members of the House who voted against the emancipation of slavery in the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. It includes all the members of the House of Representatives. It was read only for information, and not for any action of the House.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The fifth section was under consideration, having been amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the thirty-seven regiments of infantry, first provided for in the foregoing section, shall consist of those now commissioned and serving therewith, subject to such examination as the condition of their being retained in the service as is hereinafter provided for; and in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the thirty-seven regiments thus provided for, and for a period of three years after the passage of this act, all first and second lieutenants and two thirds of the officers of each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service; but graduates of the United States Military Academy and enlisted men shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in those regiments, as in the new regiments of cavalry, under the provisions of the third section of this act, and not otherwise; the Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by appointment from any officers or soldiers of volunteers or of the regular Army who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war. And all appointments of officers in the Veteran Reserve corps and in regiments of colored troops shall be made on examination, as hereinafter provided, having reference to capacity, good conduct, and efficient service in every case.

The pending question was upon the following amendment, moved by Mr. FARNSWORTH, to strike out the following:

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following: The officers of colored troops herein provided for shall be selected and appointed in the same manner provided herein for officering the six regiments of cavalry provided for in the third section of this act.

The question was taken; and Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. CONKLING as a proviso to the section, the vote on which had been reserved.

Mr. HALE. I desire to make a motion to perfect the section before the vote is taken on that amendment. I desire, with the leave of the House, to enter a motion on which I do not now desire a vote. It is an amendment, the fate of which will depend upon the disposition to be made of a subsequent section, and for that reason I ask that it shall be reserved until the House shall have considered the thirty-third section. My motion is to strike out in lines four, five, and six the words, "subject to such examination as the condition of their being retained in the service as is hereinafter provided for."

I propose hereafter to move to strike out a provision in the thirty-third section, and if that motion shall succeed then this clause will have to be stricken out.

No objection was made, and the amendment was reserved.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to move to amend the fourth section of the bill by striking out the words "of ten regiments to be raised and officered as hereinafter provided for, to be called the Veteran Reserve corps;" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to enlist men for the service who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States, or who have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, provided it shall be found, on medical inspection, that by such wounds or disability they are not unfitted for efficiency in garrison or other light duty; and such men, when enlisted, shall be assigned to such post, garrison, or other light duty, as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That there shall not be more than five thousand such enlisted men in the service at any one time.

The SPEAKER. That section is not now open to amendment. It has been passed under the operation of the previous question. The House is now engaged on the fifth section, and can only go back by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the House would allow me to go back for the purpose of offering that amendment. I propose to offer another amendment to the fifth section, and if that be adopted, this one ought to be.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to go back to the fourth section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must object to opening up that section again.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer then the following amendment to the fifth section:

Strike out the following clause:

The Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by appointment from any officers and soldiers of volunteers or of the regular Army who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned. The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war. And all appointments of officers in the Veteran Reserve corps and in regiments of colored troops shall be made on examination, as hereinafter provided, having reference to capacity, good conduct, and efficient service in every case.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

In making up the Army list, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, there shall be appointed, in accordance with the provisions of the third section of this act, from any officers and soldiers of volunteers or regulars who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, not less than ten colonels, ten lieutenant colonels, ten majors, ten adjutants, ten regimental quartermasters, [ten regimental commissaries,] one hundred captains, one hundred first lieutenants, and one hundred second lieutenants; and from any officers who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war, eight colonels, eight lieutenant colonels, eight majors, eight adjutants, eight regimental quartermasters, [eight regimental commissaries,] eighty captains, eighty first lieutenants, and eighty second lieutenants: Provided, That all officers appointed or retained in the Army, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall be on the same footing in reference to pay, relative rank, and promotion within the staff, corps, or arm of the service in which they may be appointed or retained.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain, in a few words, what this amendment is designed to accomplish. During the discussion of this bill thus far there has been developed in the House a decided purpose to follow the lead of the Military Committee in this: that those who have been wounded in the service and also a certain portion of the colored soldiers shall constitute a part of the Army. Now, what we want is to realize the wish of the House in such a way as shall come as nearly as possible to making our Army a harmonious unit.

The objection which I have to the mode in which this bill proposes to effect its purpose is that it gives us three kinds of Army: first, the Army proper, that will be known as par excellence the regular Army; second, a portion of the Army known as the Veteran Reserve corps, made up in a special and peculiar way, officered in a special and peculiar way, and kept distinct from the other branches of the Army; and third, an Army known as the colored troops of the United States, officered in a peculiar way, and kept entirely distinct from the other two classes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that nothing can be worse for the efficiency and success of our Army than discordant elements in its organization—especially in its list of officers—walls of partition built up so that of one man it shall be said, "He is an officer in the regular Army;" of another, "He is an officer of the Veteran Reserve corps;" and of another, "He is an officer of the colored troops." I believe we can have all these elements, if the House so determines, and yet not have eo nomine these distinctions, which, I am very sure, will, if adopted, be a source of infinite difficulty, dissension, and heart-burnings in the practical workings of the Army. We have seen, during the late war, how that spirit has been manifested between the volunteers and regulars. We have seen how much difficulty these distinctions have caused in every department of our Army.

What I desire is that we shall have one harmonious Army, so that between officers of the same rank there shall be no distinction in consequence of their belonging to different branches of the Army to which they belong. I desire that all officers, whether assigned to the command of colored troops or to the command of regular forces or to the command of soldiers of the Veteran Reserve corps, shall be equally eligible to promotion in any of the different departments of the Army. This is the object of my amendment.

I believe we can carry out substantially all the ideas of the military committee, and still realize more effectually the unity of the Army, by not describing a Veteran Reserve corps, with its special class of officers; the colored troops, with their special class of officers; and the Regular Army, with its special classes of officers; but by simply declaring that there shall be so many colonels, so many lieutenant colonels, so many majors, so many officers of other grades, commissioned as a part of the official roster from among men who have been wounded or otherwise partially disabled, and that they may be assigned wherever the General-in-Chief pleases to assign them.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Was there any difficulty or discord in the French Army when it consisted of Old Guards, Young Guards, and the army proper?

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, Mr. Speaker, what was consistent and harmonious in the French army fifty years ago, under their peculiar situation of affairs, cannot justify us in making up our Army of such discordant materials as these. I am thoroughly and from principle opposed to establishing this sort of divisions by name in the Army of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, under the bill as proposed by the committee, a major in a colored regiment, for instance, could not be promoted to a lieutenant colonelcy in one of the white regiments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt it is the intention of the committee that that may be done. But I desire an affirmative statement in the law to that effect, so that there can be no doubt of it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I entirely sympathize with the gentleman in that desire, and I wish to have the bill so amended (if it is not now in that shape) as to permit the promotion of officers of colored troops to higher positions in the white regiments, and the promotion of officers of white troops to higher positions in the colored regiments; so that officers in one branch of the Army shall not be excluded from promotion in another branch.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the Committee on Military Affairs will adopt any proposition that affirmatively embodies that principle.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD]—and I am glad to see his attention has been called to the subject, for we recognize the weight of his authority—to state for the benefit of the House what will be the number of officers.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will be large enough to officer ten regiments of the class of men now designated in the bill as the Veteran Reserve corps and eight regiments designated as colored troops.

Under this bill the military authorities, in making up the Army, are required to take in as many disabled officers as are needed to officer ten regiments of disabled soldiers, and the whole is to be a separate organization, known by a separate name, the Veteran Reserve corps. My amendment adopts the spirit and policy of the bill so far as to allow these disabled men to enter the Army, but it proposes to do away with these separate and special organizations with distinctive names. When the President, under the committee's bill, appoints men for the colored regiments, he must appoint men who have served as officers of colored troops. Instead of saying just such men and none other shall be appointed to command these troops, my amendment throws open the door to all officers of the Army, whether they have served in colored troops or not, and any officer appointed will be liable to be put in command of colored troops. As the bill stands, we establish a colored department, and provide a special mode for the appointment of officers for that class of troops. We also establish a Veteran Reserve corps or invalid department, and provide a special mode for the appointment of a class of officers for it. By this separate origin and appointment of officers, to be known by special names, to be ordered to special duty, it seems to me we have built up separate and dissimilar organizations, which will produce endless confusion, and make a weak and disjointed army.

The Army of the United States, Mr. Speaker, should not be an open hand with outspread fingers, but rather a doubled fist, a unit, consolidated as nearly as possible into one homogeneous organization, so that a colonel of infantry shall be a colonel for all infantry purposes, and a colonel of cavalry a colonel for all cavalry purposes, without regard to color or sanitary condition of the soldiers he commands.

I believe the amendment I have suggested, while it will require a slight modification of a few sections of the committee's bill, will work harmoniously and remove the most serious objections to what is known as the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. WRIGHT. The honorable gentleman from Ohio intimated that he was willing to accept any suggestion which would carry out his idea. I have prepared a proviso which will, I think, answer the objection he contemplates removing, and with his permission I would like to have it reported as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will hear the gentleman's amendment read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Provided, That graduates of the Military Academy at West Point and all officers of volunteers, including Veteran volunteers and the Veteran Reserve corps, shall be eligible to all offices necessary to fill vacancies under this bill: Provided, Such officer or officers can pass a satisfactory examination before a competent board of officers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot accept that. It is not germane to the subject now under discussion.

The amendment which I sent up to the Clerk's desk, and which the chairman was not willing I should go back to offer as a modification of the fourth section, was to the effect that the Secretary of War shall be authorized and directed to accept persons partially disabled as enlisted men in the Army to the number of not more than five thousand; and that when they were accepted he might put them into separate companies, if he chose, or even separate regiments. I designed in that amendment to strike out that clause of the fourth section which organized these troops as a Veteran Reserve corps, and compelled the President to aggregate all of that kind of troops and officers as a distinct organization for special service. That was my purpose in introducing it. If the amendment which is now before the House shall prevail, I hope the chairman of the committee will allow me to go back and make the necessary modification.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, every gentleman in this House accustomed to legislation, including my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] must know how much easier it is to attempt to put here and there a patch upon a bill, which after all will render it incongruous in its parts, than it is to deal with that bill as an entirety with all its parts coherent. I think if the gentleman should succeed in making some or any of the amendments he proposes, it would result in marring the harmony of the bill as it now stands, and would only render necessary its recommitment in order to "lick it into shape," to use a vulgar expression.

So far as the amendment which I objected to going back to insert in the preceding section is concerned, it is borrowing language from the tenth section of the bill, which contains a provision in reference to enlisting men who could not otherwise pass medical inspection, unless there was a statutory provision that they might be received as enlisted men in the Army. And the only object of inserting the amendment in the fourth section instead of confining it in that connection to matters to which it properly belongs, must be to get rid of the words "Veteran corps." It seems to me it would be much better in connection with the matter of enlistments, which is provided for in the tenth section.

Then comes the amendment which the gentleman now proposes to the section under consideration, that you shall not have a Veteran corps, known as such, but shall authorize the Secretary of War to receive as many into the service, of all grades, as would, if put together, make up a sufficient number of officers for ten regiments.

Now, what is to be done with these wounded officers? You are either to take them as wounded officers and mix them up with the whole of the rest of the Army, so that you shall have light duty and hard duty, garrison duty and frontier duty, to be performed by a class of men not quite well suited for hard duty, because of their suffering arising from wounds received in former service, instead of assigning to that duty the able-bodied men who are peculiarly fitted for it. You make your Army incongruous in its character as regards its efficiency and capability and the physical characteristics of its various officers. You mix them all up together.

And then does the gentleman intend to separate them, and assign them to duty in ten particular regiments? If so, that constitutes a Veteran corps, and legislate as we please on the subject it will always be called such. One of these two things he must do, either mix up improperly and inappropriately, and to the detriment of the service, officers of different physical characteristics throughout the whole Army, or else separate them. If you do the former, you encounter a difficulty in that direction. If you do the latter, you have a Veteran corps whether you choose to call it so or not. If not known by law as such, it will receive some soubriquet or nickname from those who speak of it as a part of the Army.

Then in regard to the provision as to those who have been officers of colored troops, why make a special provision that you shall select enough officers who have heretofore commanded those troops to command the eight regiments, unless you mean to have eight regiments commanded by them? Why select that particular number of men who have had experience in command of colored troops, unless you mean something by it? Why pick out enough of those officers to replete them if you are only intending to scatter them throughout the Army?

It seems to me, therefore, that the only effect of all this is simply to mix up the whole matter, and to fail either on the one hand to accomplish the object intended or else to accomplish it without giving the appropriate name, and leave it to be nicknamed in such a way as those who shall turn their attention to giving names to these particular arms of the service may choose when they shall once have been ordered.

Now, as to the latter part of the amendment, I have no objection to it. It was the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House to provide that without reference to whether they belonged to one corps or the other, in promotions hereafter to be made, there might be promotions in any one arm of the service without reference to these distinctions or divisions, and that is all that is necessary, it seems to me, to accomplish the object the gentleman has in view.

In the Senate bill, as originally printed and laid upon our tables, there was a provision that promotions in the colored troops, in the Veteran Reserve corps, or in any branch of the service should be confined to that particular division of infantry. Afterward, when the Veteran Reserve corps was dropped in the Senate, the colored troops remaining, this section was stricken out, and the bill of the Senate and the bill of the House both agree now on the subject of promotions in the divisions created between different portions of the infantry force; and therefore, the gentleman's amendment will only carry out what, it seems to me, is a fair construction of the bill, either the Senate bill or the House bill. But, in order to render it perfectly clear, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] I have no objection that it shall be made, by specific terms, to be understood that promotions in that way shall be competent hereafter. But as to the original organization of these corps, I think that while nothing is accomplished, except perhaps confusion, by that which is proposed by my colleague, he will not escape from that difficulty which he thinks, as I believe improperly, will occur from having these different branches of the infantry of the Army.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to offer an amendment which would more properly, I think, precede the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] for it is an amendment to the text for which the gentleman from Ohio offers a substitute.

I move to insert after the word "was" in the twenty-seventh line, the words:

Or from those who have served in other volunteer troops either as officers, non-commissioned officers, or privates.

That will provide that the officers selected to fill the original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served. &c.

Now, as this bill stands, there are four regiments of white cavalry and fifty-four companies of white infantry, making five and two fifths regiments; ten regiments of colored troops, being two regiments of cavalry and two of infantry; and ten regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps; and as the bill now stands, you can only appoint in all the forces provided for in this bill, from among all the troops that have served in the last war, except the invalids and those who have served with the colored troops, nine colonels, nine lieutenant colonels, nine majors, and line officers in proportion, while the bill will require you to appoint ten invalid colonels, ten invalid lieutenant colonels, ten invalid majors, and so on, and also ten colonels that have served with colored troops, ten lieutenant colonels, ten majors, and a like proportion of line officers.

The bill provides that the officers of the colored troops shall be selected exclusively from among those who have served with colored troops, while it also provides that officers who have served with the colored troops may be appointed to the command of white troops. The door is open for the captain of a colored company to compete for an appointment as captain of any one of the white regiments.

Mr. PAINE. I want to inquire of the gentleman whether this is or is not the identical amendment upon which the House voted when it resumed the consideration of this bill this morning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; it brings up the same question, but it is not the same amendment. I desire to bring the question up again, because I do not think the House understood it when they voted upon it this morning.

I do not think this House intended to confine the selection of the officers of these ten colored regiments exclusively to those who have served with colored troops, while those officers at the same time may be appointed in any of the regiments of white troops provided for by this bill. In the reorganization of the Army why should we, among all the troops that have served in this war, select ten colonels from among those officers who served with colored troops, when you select from the great mass of the other soldiers only nine colonels for the other regiments?

And it is proposed by this bill that ten colonels, ten lieutenant colonels, and ten majors shall be selected for the Veteran Reserve corps from among the invalids of our soldiers, while only nine colonels are to be appointed from sound and able-bodied men.

Now, I think the bill ought to be amended in these respects. I think that the door should be opened more widely, and that we should not make a privileged class, but allow the Government, in the selection of these officers, to select from among any who have served in the late war.

Mr. PAINE. I voted this morning for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and I believe I was the only member of the House besides himself who did vote in favor of it. And I am still in favor of it as an independent proposition.

But I feel it my duty to call attention to some statements made by the gentleman from Illinois which seem to me to be incorrect. I think he has not correctly stated the number of colonelcies which shall be open to volunteers outside of the Veteran Reserve corps and the colored troops. In the first place there are the six new cavalry regiments, for which colonels are to be provided.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Two of those regiments are to be colored regiments.

Mr. PAINE. Then there are four new cavalry regiments, at any rate. Then there are eighteen new infantry regiments for which colonels are to be appointed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How does the gentleman make out the eighteen new infantry regiments?

Mr. PAINE. There are now nine regiments consisting of three battalions each, which are to be converted into twenty-seven regiments, thus providing for eighteen new colonels.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. These twenty-seven battalions are to be increased by adding two companies to each battalion, and there are to be appointed, therefore, only the two captains and the two lieutenants for these two new companies of each battalion.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman from Illinois seems to suppose that these three-battalion regiments already have a colonel for each battalion. Now, in these nine three-battalion regiments there are only nine colonels, and this bill, by providing for changing each battalion into a regiment by the addition of two companies, making a regiment of ten companies of each battalion, will provide eighteen new colonelcies to be filled by appointment. Those eighteen, with four for the new regiments of cavalry that are to be composed of white troops, will make at least twenty-two colonelcies to be filled by appointment from among persons other than those persons in the Veteran Reserve corps, or the colored regiments.

But they are not all. There may be other vacancies in the artillery regiments, in the old regiments of cavalry, or in the colonelcies of the nine three-battalion regiments; and if there should be such vacancies, then any volunteer officer will be eligible to appointment to fill any such vacancy. There is no clause in this bill, from beginning to end, which renders a volunteer officer ineligible to any such position in our artillery, cavalry or infantry regiments.

Now, I was inclined, as the gentleman from Illinois is inclined, to throw open these commissions in the colored regiments to wounded officers and soldiers of volunteers and the regular Army, and to graduates of West Point. And I voted for his proposition to that effect. But this proposition seems to me to be the same which he presented before and which the House has already decided in the negative. And I think it is hardly proper to call upon the House again to pass upon the same proposition.

But there is one consideration which ought not to be overlooked in this case; that is, that the officers of the colored regiments are included among the volunteers in the general distribution of offices in the Army. That consideration would be a reason in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, and it was the main reason which influenced my vote in favor of the proposition he submitted on yesterday. I admit its weight; and if the proposition should come up anew I should vote for it, as I did this morning. But at the same time, I cannot agree with the gentleman in supposing that without his amendment these volunteers would be cut off to the extent he imagines. On the contrary, I think the provisions of the bill are broader than he supposes. I shall therefore vote against his amendment now pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question upon the pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust my colleague will ask the previous question only on the amendment to the amendment; I would like to say a word on the amendment.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Before the previous question is called, I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I desire to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] by striking out the words "regimental commissary" wherever they occur. I believe that that office is unnecessary.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is the seventh section which provides for this office; and we have not yet reached that section.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I desire to strike out these words in this amendment; and when we come to the seventh section I shall move to amend that also.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that when we come to the section referred to by the chairman of the committee, if the House should then decide to dispense with this office altogether that will apply to the whole bill, while if we adopt the gentleman's amendment now it will still not effect the general purpose. The gentleman had better wait till we reach the seventh section rather than involve us now in a general discussion whether we shall dispense with the office of regimental commissary in the whole organization of the Army.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Well, then, I give notice that when we reach the seventh section I shall move to strike out the words "regimental commissary" wherever they occur.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] will not prevail, because in the first place I do not see the reasons why we should dispense with the office of regimental commissary. But still it may be that when the general discussion on that subject shall come up, I may be led to take a different view from that which I now hold. Hence, without pronouncing either for or against the proposition, I hope the gentleman will not press the amendment until we come to the section which treats of the organization of a regiment.

While on the floor, I wish, if the gentleman will allow me, to say a word with reference to my amendment, in response to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I do not believe that the amendment which I offer as a substitute for the latter portion of this section will embarrass at all the general provisions of the bill. The whole manner of selecting these officers, so far as it is set forth in my amendment, was borrowed bodily from one of the subsequent sections of the bill as it lies before me; and therefore it will not, if adopted, be a patch or a blotch upon the bill.

As it is now proposed to have ten regiments consolidated and known as the Veteran Reserve corps, it seems to me that we shall have trouble in the future in continuing the organization of that corps. Is this corps to be kept up perpetually? Manifestly not; for the day will come, we trust, when we shall not have, among the population of this country, a sufficient number of men wounded in military service to supply the ranks of this Veteran Reserve corps. The time will therefore come when young blood will be infused into the Army, and when this Veteran Reserve corps will cease by the very inability to enlist men of the class described. Now, why not let those of this class come in and be put in separate companies if the Secretary of War so chooses, and when they fail to come forward in sufficient numbers to keep filled up the ten regiments their places can be supplied without the necessity for any new legislation? You will not then have to tear down the structure of your Army. It can move on under its present organization, and without a jar.

But if you put into the Army this Veteran Reserve corps by name—if you have a specific, definite, well-defined body of men known as the Veteran Reserve corps—you will be obliged some day to reform your legislation, and remodel your Army, simply because of this provision for the Veteran Reserve corps as a permanent branch of the Army. I desire that we shall organize our Army in such a way that it can be maintained permanently without the necessity hereafter of new legislation, when it shall be no longer practicable to preserve a Veteran Reserve corps.

Besides, sir, who knows that we want just ten regiments of this sort consolidated in one body? A company of these disabled soldiers may be required, for instance, at Milwaukee or at Sault Ste. Marie. A company, or two companies, may be required here or there along the northern border, along the Atlantic sea-board, on the Gulf, or on the Mexican frontier; and sometimes a regiment or half a regiment of able-bodied troops may be required in conjunction with one or two companies that may not be classed as able-bodied. Therefore, let the Secretary of War have discretion, if you please, for one regiment of disabled heroes, for one company of these disabled men in a regiment, and nine companies of able sound men. Let us not compel him to have a whole regiment made up entirely of only that class of persons. Let him distribute them through the Army as the best interests of the service may demand.

Now, it is proposed by this bill he shall have these ten regiments known by a special name and collected in a special body. I think it will work evil to the Army, and it will certainly be inharmonious. I am thoroughly persuaded if the amendment I have offered be adopted, with a few amendments, not in the spirit, not in the structure, but only in the incidental form, we will make it a more acceptable and desirable bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not think when I yielded that it was for the purpose of again going over the whole discussion of the amendment. I will say now to my colleague, that in reference to his own amendment, he himself admits these troops are to be kept separate. There is to be one company of them in each regiment. Those companies will be mixed up with companies of men of another class, and the officers commanding the companies with officers of another class of troops.

His objection is to their being called the Veteran Reserve corps. If they are not called the Veteran Reserve corps, separated as he proposes, perhaps they will get a name which may be worse. I think the name of Veteran Reserve corps is a good one. It is significant and honorable and descriptive of that which they have done, and indicating what they have earned. I suppose by wiping out the idea of a Veteran Reserve corps, and having one of these companies to a regiment, the gentleman thinks he has accomplished everything. It may be we will then hear of the cripple companies or the regiment of cripples or of "condemned Yankees," as the rebels speak of them, or some other nickname. I protest against that. If we are going to have a Veteran Reserve corps, and it seems to me the House so moved on this question yesterday by a vote of 80 to 30, let us meet the question. If we are not going to have it, let us not take it in fact and yet shrink from giving it its name, but have it nicknamed in some other way.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out the words "regimental commissary" wherever they occur in the amendment or in the bill.

I do this because I believe neither economy nor justice demand the creation of this office. By reference to the Army Register, I see only six regimental commissaries in the old organization. They are attached to cavalry regiments, and to cavalry regiments alone. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, or the bill should pass, it would create seventy-one officers whose pay would not be less than $200 per month. During the rebellion the same duties were discharged by commissary sergeants at twenty-one dollars per month, and I do not see why they should not continue to be so discharged.

Mr. SCHENCK. All I have to say is, that while I have doubted the necessity of having these two offices, concurrent military authority, and especially of the heads of the commissary and the quartermaster's departments, induced the committee to adopt the separation. It was so provided in the Senate bill as recommended by the military commission. As it is, one officer combines in his own person the qualities of two distinct offices, having to account to two distinct departments. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I demand the previous question on all the amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments of Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. VAN AERNAM were both rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and SCHENCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 58, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Good-year, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hogan, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbell, Kelley, Kelso, Loan, McClurg, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Spalding, Taber, Francis Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Wentworth, Williams, and Wright—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Boyer, Bundy, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McKee, Mercur, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Stilwell, Taylor, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, and Woodbridge—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Deftrees, Delano, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Lathin, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, McCullough, McIndoe, Morrill, Moulton, Noel, Ord, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanklin, Sloan, Starr, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Warner, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—74.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. INGERSOLL stated that he was paired with Mr. J. L. THOMAS.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. CONKLING to add to the section the following proviso:

Provided, That all officers of the existing Veteran Reserve corps, except those now actually detailed for duty in the Freedmen's Bureau or otherwise actually and necessarily employed, shall, upon the passage of this act, be mustered out of service and put upon the same footing with other disabled officers not now in service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BOUTWELL in the chair.) On this amendment the main question is ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment. And I call attention to the fact that the previous question exhausted itself on the amendment preceding this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, upon reflection, thinks that the previous question has exhausted itself and does not cover this amendment. The Clerk is of a different opinion, and the Chair followed that.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was not understood that the previous question covered this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the amendment is open to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Would it be in order to stop discussion on this section? I have no objection to amendments being offered and voted upon.

The SPEAKER, (resuming the chair.) The House is not in Committee of the Whole, and debate is limited to fifteen minutes. The previous question being applied to any section cuts off any member from amending it. You pass by the section by the operation of the previous question and go on to the next.

Mr. SCHENCK. My object is to stop the interminable discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen may arrive at that object if the House will consent that debate shall be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and allow fifteen minutes for and against each amendment. Then, when debate is closed on a section, amendments can be offered and voted on, but not debated. Now, the previous question cuts off both debate and further amendment. Shall the rule be adopted as in Committee of the Whole?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the ruling of the Speaker pro tempore, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that debate was not cut off upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] This proviso was reserved when the previous question was demanded by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the necessity of this amendment. The Department can muster out at any time. And if after you pass this bill you muster them out they will all be entitled to three months' pay, according to the law.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has taken the pains to ascertain how many officers of the present corps would be retained in the corps to be established if an impartial distribution of commissions takes place among all the wounded officers and soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not taken any such pains, because I do not see what it has to do with the selection of officers impartially. That is drawing lots, I suppose. Those who have the appointment of them will select just whom they choose, twenty, thirty, or forty, by name. And as I said before, so much will be saved by allowing them to stay in. If they are not wanted they will be mustered out. I cannot see any need of mustering all of them out and letting them go home and draw three months' pay, and then bringing in the same men again.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is merely singling out these wounded officers of the Veteran corps, and giving direction to the War Department to do what they can do in other cases. Congress has never done any such thing before. They are all left under the operation of law to be dealt with by the military authorities in the same way. I do not understand why any such discrimination should be made. Or if made in this case, I would suggest whether we might not as well extend it to other officers and give instructions as to the mustering out of other arms of the service.

I demand the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope not without giving me an opportunity to state why I offered it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I supposed the gentleman was through. I have made no special argument against it and I really wish to get through this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to explain in one word why I offered this amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I move the previous question on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman, then, refuses to allow an explanation to be made. We will see whether we can carry out the understanding of the House or not.

The question was taken on the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 31, noes 61.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to detain the House but for a moment. And I wish first to repel entirely the insinuation made again by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that any assault is intended upon these wounded officers. It must have been repeated, I think, for the benefit of the galleries here and the galleries elsewhere; because I hope no gentleman upon this floor is to be frightened from his propriety or sense by the repetition of a statement which has no foundation whatever in fact. An assault upon whom? The House has consented to retain this provision upon the guarantee—for it comes to that—of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that impartiality, in theory and in substance, is to be preserved in the dispensation of these commissions. How? By putting upon a par the wounded officers and soldiers of the country; by not making a distinction in favor of those who for the past three years have been enjoying what, in the parlance of the day, are called "the soft places" in the Army. I say that the House has consented to retain this provision in the bill upon the assurance and declaration that the bill is to be so modified as to secure that impartiality.

This provision is offered merely to carry out that understanding; merely to say that these officers, except so far as they are now in some way employed, shall be put simply upon a par, fairly, with other officers disabled by disease or wounds.

We are met by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs with the objection that such a provision is unnecessary. I will admit it for the sake of the argument. If it be unnecessary certainly it will do no harm. Let us put it in out of abundant caution, so that wounded officers throughout the country, even though they are not here in Washington, or belonging to any organization keeping special guard and watch over our legislation, may know that they have the same opportunities as anybody else. If this amendment is mere surplusage it is harmless, and let it be adopted for the sake of fair dealing, and to carry out the understanding of the House.

The able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] makes a practical suggestion; he says that this amendment would involve some expense. I beg to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] whose fairness and good judgment as exhibited on this floor I respect as a military man, whether it be true that the mustering out of the service of ten, twenty, or thirty of these men, assuming that they would be reappointed, would involve any expense whatever that would be appreciable or to be talked about? I will thank him to state to the House whether it would or would not.

Mr. PAINE. In answer to an inquiry made by the gentleman some little time ago I replied that the expense of mustering out these officers would not be appreciable. But it did not occur to me then that there would be the three months' pay due. I do not know now how that matter would stand. If that extra pay were involved of course it would be an additional expense; but I do not know how that matter stands.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WILLIAM J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolutions of the House No. 88, expressive of the thanks of Congress to General Winfield S. Hancock, and No. 108, appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. CONKLING. Everybody will see, assuming that the three months' pay would be due, that the expense would not be so great as if we continued the regular pay of all these men pending the selection. Again, I am informed that a muster-out and a muster-in, as a simultaneous act, would not involve this three months' pay.

Now, if I can get the attention of the members of this House, I ask them to consider for a moment the utter insignificance of the expense of which we are speaking. I have had a computation made, approximating certainly as nearly as I can arrive at it by consulting gentlemen who know, which shows that there cannot be fewer than two hundred thousand men and officers in the country who have served in the armies of the Republic, and who have become disabled by wounds or disease. Now, in these ten regiments there are three hundred and sixty commissions, or in the proportion of about one commission to each forty disabled officers and soldiers in the country. So that if the distribution of these offices should be made according to an impartial rule of selection, there would be about nine commissions to be given to the three hundred and fifty or four hundred officers of the Veteran Reserve corps not now provided for. Therefore, the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] results in just this, that there may be incurred the expense of mustering out nine men who will be mustered in again. And that can be provided for by the insertion of a word or two in some subsequent section of the bill.

Now, I hope that, as a large majority of this House voted to retain this provision concerning the Veteran Reserve corps, upon the express understanding that all wounded officers and wounded men are to be allowed barely to compete upon an equal footing for these commissions, that understanding will be carried out, and carried out certainly, even if we put in a provision for abundant caution, which we might do without. That will do no harm, and this amendment is intended only for that purpose. It is intended to prevent any advantage being gained by those who happen to be in Washington, who may happen to have such facility of access to the Department as will give them an advantage when the bill comes to be administered.

It is suggested to me to call the previous question, which I will not do, however, if it will cut off any other gentleman who desires to be heard upon this subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not intend to pursue the course of argument which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] seems to invite upon this subject. His elegant self-complacency at times in his treatment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is only surpassed by the severe irony I always receive from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] on the other side of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker—[Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER?]

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman can speak some other time. I have always received severe irony from that quarter, for proof of which I refer to the files of the Globe, and the reports of the debates therein contained. It is my misfortune to be so situated on both sides.

I indicated my opinion that the course of this debate had developed hostility to this Veteran Reserve corps upon the part of the gentleman from New York on my right, [Mr. CONKLING.] I do not think I am mistaken in that assertion; I do not think anybody in this House will differ with me. Nor do I think there is any question about the fact that when defeated in one mode of assault he resorts to another.

But I do not put my reply to his proposition upon any ground of that kind, or upon any such ground merely. I said before, as I say again, that to introduce a provision of this kind into a law, calling upon the executive authority, upon the War Department, to exercise this power of mustering out in reference to one particular class of officers or of men, is an unusual course, is an unprecedented course of proceeding. In this as in all other cases, where men or officers are to be mustered out of or retained in service, whatever requests might be attempted to be made by resolution or otherwise, it is hardly necessary to put in a solemn legislative enactment any instruction to the Executive upon that subject.

Now, this House is not bound, any more than is the Executive, by any resolution that may have been passed upon this subject. In fact, no resolution of the kind has ever been passed. Gentlemen are mistaken upon that point, and I will correct them, so far as that is concerned.

The history of that resolution, offered at a very early day in the present session of Congress, is simply this: there had been a proposition made and urged by some persons not particularly friendly to this Veteran Reserve corps, or its continuance or connection with the Army in any capacity whatever, to submit to the men of that corps the question whether or not they would vote to be mustered out and go home. The result was precisely what would follow if you were to submit such a question to the vote of any regiment, brigade, or division of the Army, or the crew of sailors on board any vessel in our Navy. There is not a body of soldiers or sailors in our service who would not vote themselves out for a holiday if they had the opportunity, although they might be looking for a chance to reenlist three days afterward. Hence they all scattered; they went to their homes. Then the Secretary of War, always friendly to this Veteran Reserve corps, himself the originator, or at least the executor of the idea which called that corps into existence, was puzzled to know what it was his duty to do in regard to the matter. A number of gentlemen, members of this House, accompanied by one or more Senators, believing that it would be an act of great harshness if these wounded or disabled officers who had been selected and placed in this corps should be turned out at once, with the question still unsettled whether any of them were to be retained in the service or not, and with no provision in reference to the subsistence of themselves or their families, called upon the Secretary of War, who, after a full conversation, manifested his willingness to retain those officers until it should be settled whether we were to have a Veteran Reserve corps, for whose officers some of these men might perhaps be selected, provided there could be some sort of official indication of the wish of Congress that these officers should be thus retained.

In consequence of this, the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, after considering the whole matter, directed me to report a resolution, a copy of which I hold in my hand; and this is the resolution about which so much has been said. It was drawn up as a joint resolution, and is in these terms:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to suspend any order mustering out the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps, until Congress shall have time to consider the subject, and take some legislative action as to the future disposition to be made of that corps."

That resolution being sent to the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of that body, and it has there slept ever since. There is no resolution on that subject now on the statute-book. Hence the Military Department is left at liberty to take such action as in the exercise of its discretion and military authority may be thought necessary or proper with regard to the mustering out of the officers and men of this corps.

But, sir, what I object to—and this is the whole of my objection—is the impropriety of inserting in a grave legislative act an instruction to the executive department to deal in a particular way with a particular branch of the public service, when nothing of that kind has ever heretofore been done, or has been thought proper to be done, in reference to any other class of men or officers employed in the military service.

Now, sir, there are in the military service men who might, perhaps, be mustered out. There are officers whom we once sought to have mustered out, when it was admitted that some of them had been for a year or more entirely unemployed, and were likely to remain so. But even in that action of ours, the Senate of the United States refused its concurrence. There has never been any action upon the part of the legislative power instructing, informing, or directing the Military Department upon such a subject as this. That, at least, is my present recollection, and I think no one is able to contradict it.

I object, therefore, to any such invidious distinction, any such odious discrimination, being made against any class of officers or men, whether wounded or not wounded, whether belonging to the regular Army or to one of the volunteer branches of the Army, as to embody in a legislative act our instructions that there must be some haste in clearing them out of the way before it shall be considered whether any of them are to be retained in the service, or clearing out of the way as many of them as do not happen at this moment to be employed.

Then, again, the language of the amendment is "who were not necessarily employed." Now, who, after all, is to determine the meaning of that word "necessarily?" So long as we have a Military Department, the discretion with reference to this matter must, after all, rest with that Department; and I am willing it shall rest there.

Now, sir, as the gentleman from New York has advocated his amendment, and as I have replied to him, I do not know that I will be considered illiberal if I ask the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I call the previous question on the whole section will that cut off amendments?

The SPEAKER. It will cut off amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. There are gentlemen who want to offer amendments in good faith, and I therefore only call the previous question on the pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CONKLING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 43, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Baker, Baldwin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Davis, Dodge, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Julian, Kelso, Loan, Marvin, McRuer, Mereur, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Upson, Van Arman, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Wright—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Garfield, Hale, Hayes, Hogan, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kelley, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, Miller, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Stevens, Taylor, Thayer, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Whaley, Windom, and Woodbridge—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deftrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eliot, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Laffin, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Bond, Marshall, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Moulton, Newell, Niblack, Noell, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—81.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, stated that his colleague, Mr. LAFLIN, was absent on account of sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to add the following:

And it shall be lawful to appoint and commission as officers in any of the organizations authorized by this act any persons who have been distinguished for gallant and meritorious service in the Army of the United States during the late rebellion, and have been wounded or partially disabled therein while in the line of their duty: Provided, The disability arising therefrom shall be such only, as if incurred in the regular service under officers' commissions would not incapacitate them from duty therein.

Mr. Speaker, I offer that amendment because I believe it to be entirely just; and in submitting it, I wish to repel the insinuation made against me upon this floor yesterday that I was willing to do injustice to any branch of our Army or to any soldiers who have been in the field. I believe the provisions of this bill do injustice to thousands and tens of thousands who exposed themselves gallantly in defense of the flag of the country. They are restrictive. My desire is to open the way to all of the soldiers who have been disabled, provided they are fit for this duty.

It was charged yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Illinois that I had slandered the Veteran Reserve corps. I deny it. I said they were disabled; does he deny it? Is it a slander upon a soldier of the Army who bore the flag of his country over a defying fortress to say that he was wounded in the body or lost a limb or an eye in the service? I honor the gallantry and service of that soldier, but I do not slander him when I say that he has been disabled.

By this amendment I do not wish to give to the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps alone the benefit of these provisions, but I wish to give it to all who have been in the service, whether officers or privates.

The loss of a finger or of an eye disables a man under the present law so that he cannot be retained in the Army service unless he happens to be in the regular Army. In the regular Army a man thus wounded is not disqualified to serve, but still retains his rank. I ask, in God's name, why should not a man who suffers only equal disability in the volunteer service be entitled to the same benefits and advantage.

I offer this amendment, and I deny that any word that I have uttered on this floor can be tortured into anything like discourtesy to the disabled soldiers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question on the section and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 248) for the relief of James G. Clarke; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Alexander Thompson, late United States consul at Maranhão.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to make a personal explanation in regard to the action of the House upon the passage of the joint resolution appropriating $25,000 for the benefit of the poor of the District of Columbia. I apprehend that the House did injustice to my colleague upon the Committee for the District of Columbia, [Mr. SHANKLIN.] It was the understanding between himself and myself that when that resolution came up for action in the House he should be heard in opposition to its passage. It is but justice to him to state that he was opposed to it, and desired to make some remarks in opposition to its passage, and as a member of the committee, and its chairman, I had given my assent, and supposed that the House would extend to him that courtesy.

When I called the resolution up the gentleman rose and asked to be heard. I stated to the House that I hoped he might be heard, and I desired to yield to him before the previous question should be ordered so that he might express his views in opposition to the resolution. There were several voices heard all around me on this side of the House in opposition to my yielding to him, and I acceded reluctantly to that expressed opposition, believing that the House would, after the adoption of the previous question, allow him to be heard. I regret that the courtesy due to him as my colleague on the committee was not then extended to him. I did at the time what I thought was just, and if I did him any injustice I regret it. It was not intentional on my part. I beg to assure the House that my relations with that gentleman have been of the most cordial character, and that I esteem him very highly, and should regret to be a party to any act of injustice or want of courtesy toward him.

I hope this explanation will be satisfactory to him, and that he will give assent, or at least make no objection, to his reappointment by the Speaker upon that committee.

Mr. SHANKLIN. The explanation of the gentleman covers, I suppose, the whole ground in relation to myself, and is entirely satisfactory. I accept the explanation and apology.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reappoints the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHANKLIN] on the Committee for the District of Columbia.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Thomas J. Powell, praying for relief.

By Mr. AMES: The petition of South Scituate Savings Bank, for repeal of the internal revenue tax on savings institutions.

By Mr. DAVIS: The memorial of B. F. Rexford, James S. Leach, and others, attorneys of the Federal courts in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending in the Senate for the reorganization of the Federal courts.

By Mr. DELANO: The petition of George W. Penny, and 1,200 others, citizens and wool-growers of Licking county, Ohio, praying an increased duty on foreign wool, and the protection of wool-growers equal to that of manufacturers of this country.

By Mr. DODGE: The memorial of Richardson, Boynton & Co., and J. L. Mott & Co., and others, relative to the manufacture of stoves.

Also, the memorial of George W. Blunt, Moses H. Grinnell, and others, urging that an appropriation be made for the payment of the officers and crew of the Kearsarge for the destruction of the Alabama.

Also, the memorial of manufacturers of flax and hemp, praying an increased duty on imported articles made from hemp.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of J. W. Shaunan, M. M. B. Boyce, and others, citizens of Illinois, for uniform insurance laws.

Also, the petition of citizens of Kane county, Illinois, in favor of increasing tariff upon wool.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Coatesburg, Illinois, to exempt from taxation alcohol used in medical preparations.

By Mr. HOLMES: The remonstrance of D. M. K. Johnson, and others, citizens of Oneida county, New York, against the passage of the bill reorganizing the Federal judiciary.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: Two petitions from citizens of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, for an increase of duty on foreign wools.

By Mr. LONGYEAR: The petition of Henry C. Andrus, and 75 others, citizens of Battle Creek, Michigan, asking for an increased duty on wool.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Campbell & Thayer, Grove & Brother, Judd Linseed and Sperm Oil Company, John E. Lewis & Brothers, and others, manufacturers of linseed oil in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, for increase of the tariff on foreign linseed oil to thirty cents per gallon, and for the removal of the discrimination of ten per cent. on linseed imported direct.

Also, the petition of citizens of the State of Delaware, asking that the salary of Ephraim L. Lockerman, keeper of the light house at Reedy Island, in Delaware bay, now but $400, may be increased.

By Mr. MILLER: A petition from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the Constitution of the United States be amended so that the President and Vice President may be chosen by the qualified voters directly without the intervention of Electoral Colleges, and that the voting for these offices be confined to citizens who can read.

Also, a petition from citizens of the counties of Union and Northumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to impose such conditions upon rebel States as shall punish treason and reward loyalty with confidence and honor.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of W. H. Walker, and 24 others, citizens of Ludlow, Vermont, praying for the establishment of a national Bureau of Insurance.

Also, the petition of H. A. White, and others, citizens of Washington, Orange county, Vermont, praying for an increased tariff on wool.

Also, the petition of S. M. Dikeman, and others, citizens of Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on wool.

Also, the petition of Elliot E. Kellogg, and 43 others, citizens of Windham county, Vermont, praying for an increased tariff on wool.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of John Hatfield for relief.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of J. B. Tompkins, and 49 others, citizens of Girard, Branch county, Michigan, praying Congress to increase the duties on foreign wool.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of wool-growers of Butler county, Pennsylvania, asking for an increase of duty on foreign wools.

By Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Joseph B. Roper, for compensation for damages done him and his property by Indians.

Also, the petition of Edmund Blanchard, executor of the last will and testament of Captain Evan M. Buchanan, deceased, for the passage of a law releasing the estate of said Buchanan from the payment of the sum of $436 89, due the United States from him as commissary of subsistence, third division, sixth Army corps, United States Army.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The petition of Prosper Elithorp, and 55 others, citizens of Bridgeport, Vermont; and also the petition of George Hammond, and 36 others, citizens of Addison county, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on foreign wool.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 19, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McDUGALL. A few days since I presented some remarks to the Senate of a personal character. It was and is the opinion of my most trusted and nearest friends that the remarks of which I speak were not justified by the then present occasion, were in violation of the true rule of decorum, and were also offensive to this body. Under the influence of such counsels and with careful thought it has become my conviction that the judgment of those to whom I have referred was and is correct. I have always thought that it was nobler to confess an unpremeditated wrong than even to maintain the right. With this conviction I have risen to acknowledge the wrong, to express my profound regret, and to ask the pardon of this body. I do this with more than mere satisfaction.

It is further due to myself, as also to the Senator, my colleague, that I should request his pardon; this I now do. I had at the moment forgotten the old rule, a conclusion stated in a supposed Socratic discussion, Ad Tusculum, "Avoid the perturbations." I violated the injunction, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." With the morning, when the morn stood "tiptoe on the misty mountain-tops," there came penitence.

These short remarks are designed to be penitential.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of Mary K. Smith, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for such an increase of the duties on imports as will afford ample protection to American labor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Catharine F. Winslow, mother of Cleveland Winslow, deceased, late lieutenant colonel fifth New York Veteran volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, representing that the tax of six per cent. ad valorem which is imposed upon the gross amount of sales arising from the class of stoves composed of cast and sheet iron respectively, in addition to the tax and duty previously paid on the component parts of the same, amounting to ten and three fourths per cent. on the gross amount of sales, is a rate which far exceeds that laid upon any other article of iron manufacture, and praying that this special tax upon the class of stoves composed of cast and sheet iron, shall be imposed upon the increased value only; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of D. A. Daniels, praying for pay as second lieutenant of the third Minnesota battery from the 3d of February to the 28th of May, 1863, inclusive; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POLAND. I present the petition of George W. Tarleton, setting forth that he was at the commencement of the rebellion a resident of Mobile, Alabama, and a loyal citizen. He was the owner of property to the amount of some five or six thousand dollars in the State of New York, bonds, mortgage, and other property; and proceedings were instituted against the property on the ground that he was a rebel in arms against the Government, and this without any notice to him or any opportunity to have notice; and the property was confiscated and taken by the Government. He prays that it may be restored to him. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department, have directed me to report it back with the recommendation that the amendment be concurred in. It is a very simple matter, and I trust the Senate will at once consider the amendment.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to add to the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That this joint resolution shall not be construed to increase the appropriations already made for the service of the Post Office Department.

The amendment was concurred in.

REGISTERS TO VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir, have directed me to report it back with the recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, with an amendment. As this is an important measure, and it is important that it should be immediately acted upon, I ask the Senate to consider it now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, which was to add to it the following words:

And American registers, or enrollment and license, to the following-named vessels, that is to say, to the sloop Jenny Lind of Wolf Island, of Oswego, New York; the schooner Coquette, of Oakville; Trenton, of Trenton; Forest Queen; Two Brothers, of Wallaceburg; Minetta, of Gananoque; and Elizabeth, of Oswego, New York; the bark St. Elizabeth, of Provincetown, Massachusetts; the barks Advance and Acorn, and schooner Asia, of Chicago, Illinois; the steamer Prince Albert, of Georgetown, District of Columbia; the brig Maitland, propeller Niagara, and steamboat Canadian, of Buffalo, New York; the schooner E. P. Ryerse, of Cleveland, Ohio; the schooner Eureka, of Marzaretta, Ohio; the brigantine City of Toronto, of Erie, Pennsylvania; and the schooner Wavertree, of Cleveland, Ohio.

The Committee on Commerce reported in favor of concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives, with an amendment, as follows:

And American registers, or enrollment and license, to the following-named vessels, that is to say, the ship Screamer, now called the Roamer, of Brunswick, Maine; the barge Mary, of Detroit; the steam-tug Sampson, of Detroit; and the schooners Caldonia and Enterprise, of Detroit; and the Anglo-Saxon, a Canadian-built vessel.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House, as amended, was concurred in.

The title of the bill was amended by adding the words, "and for other purposes."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post

Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 236) to authorize and establish certain post roads, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of John Ericsson, praying for compensation for his services in planning the United States war steamer Princeton and planning and superintending the construction of the machinery therefor, together with an opinion of the Court of Claims in his favor, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of John Ericsson. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 215) concerning certain land granted to the State of Nevada, have instructed me to report it with amendments, for the purpose of having the amendments printed and the bill recommended to the committee.

The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the bill was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a communication from the Postmaster General on the subject of a patent canceling and marking stamp used by that Department, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 70) making compensation to Shaver & Corse, assignees, for the use of a combined post-marking and canceling stamp by the Post Office Department; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Cornelius Crowley, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 275) for the relief of Cornelius Crowley. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Linn county, Iowa, praying that a pension may be granted to Mrs. Jerusha Witter, widow of Dr. Amos Witter, late surgeon of the seventh regiment Iowa infantry, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 276) for the relief of Mrs. Jerusha Witter. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

CONDITION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the Senate of the United States with any additional official reports or information he may have received relative to the condition of the southern people and the States lately in rebellion.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of transferring the Bureau of Indian Affairs from the Department of the Interior to the Department of War, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that I think there is now a resolution of that character before one of the committees. I have no objection, however, to the adoption of this.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

OBITUARY ADDRESSES ON SENATOR FOOT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution for printing the addresses delivered on the announcement of the death of Hon. Solomon Foot, with the funeral sermon of Rev. Dr. Sunderland, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be published in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, six thousand copies of the addresses made by the members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives upon the occasion of the announcement of the death of Hon. Solomon Foot; and that Rev. Dr. Sunderland be requested to furnish a copy of the sermon delivered by him at the funeral of Senator Foot, to be published with said addresses.

The resolution was adopted.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the admission of Colorado was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is whether the Senate will take up the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question. The question is, Will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of that subject?

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not proceed with the consideration of that question to-day, and I assign two reasons why they should not proceed with it to-day. The first is that on looking about the Senate I see many Senators absent who ought to be here at the consideration of so important a question. That is my first reason. The second reason is that this day in this city is dedicated to the cause of human freedom and human rights—of emancipation. The streets to-day are filled with a happy people, emancipated by act of Congress, who are celebrating the anniversary of their rights. It is, sir, no proper day in which to proceed to recognize human inequality and in which to receive into this Union a community which chooses to insult the age by appearing here with a constitution setting at defiance the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Independence. Sir, this is no day in which to proceed with the consideration of that question. I insist that this day shall be kept consecrated to human rights, that it shall not be given up to an attempt to recognize the overthrow of human rights.

I may be told, sir, that there are but ninety colored persons in this distant Territory who are to be sacrificed. If there were but one, that would be enough to justify my opposition. Out of those ninety, more than seventy-five I am told have borne arms for you in the late war; and yet these people are now positively disfranchised in the constitution which it is proposed to recognize. Sir, if you choose to do it, if you choose to insult the public sentiment of this age by such an act, do not do it to-day.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have made this motion this morning in pursuance of a notice which I gave yesterday. My colleague opposes it, as he has a right to do, although he was one of the most prompt men in the Senate to take up the proposition to authorize Colorado to do precisely what she has done. He voted not only to take up that proposition in preference to other business, but he voted for the bill to allow Colorado to make a constitution and come here, and that bill authorized her to make this distinction or not to make it, just as she pleased. That bill did not even make a suggestion that she should secure equality before the law to all her citizens. On the 8d day of March, 1863, my colleague voted that the people of the Territory of Colorado should be authorized to frame a constitution, and that the President should admit her into the Union, when she framed it, on his proclamation. He did not then propose to provide that she should not make this distinction. He never suggested it; he did not dream of it. All of us on this side of the Chamber, I think, voted for that bill; and had Colorado framed her constitution immediately, she would be in the Union to-day just as Nevada is, for which he also voted. Although I voted against taking up the proposition when my colleague voted to do so, yet when it was up, and we came to a vote on the passage of the bill, I voted for it; and the vote was 18 to 17; but it was not passed until March 1864.

Now, sir, the people of Colorado have availed themselves of the liberty which I gave them and which my colleague gave them, by our votes, and they have framed a constitution which they have presented here. I voted the other day against that admission, but I must confess that in doing so I did not feel satisfied that I was dealing fairly with the people of Colorado. I do not think it is fair play, after we passed the bill, which we did pass in 1864, and after the most enterprising and vigorous men in that Territory, who agree with a majority of us in this Chamber, have framed a constitution, and came here for admission, for us to refuse their application on the ground of a distinction which they have made in their constitution, when we did not ask them to refrain from making such a distinction; when we imposed no conditions on them; when we did not suggest any. After this course of legislation it seems to me too late now to raise a question upon that point.

That, sir, is my position. I have moved this reconsideration, and shall sustain it for the reasons I have stated. I am free to say, however, that I will vote for no more enabling acts to allow the people of any Territory to frame a constitution that shall make any such distinction. Under no circumstances whatever will I ever authorize any of the other Territories which have not yet had enabling acts, to frame a constitution which shall make such a distinction. We have advanced in the career of our progress to that position, and I think it will be dishonorable in us to allow anything of that kind. We, however, gave this people an enabling act, in which we did not tell them that they should not make this discrimination, and did not even suggest it; and that enabling act came, too, from the men of this body who profess to be the strongest in their devotion to the equal rights of man.

Therefore, sir, I have made this motion, and I hope that this vote will be reconsidered. I do not wish to press a vote upon the bill if Senators desire it to go over until we can have a full Senate next week; and after the vote is reconsidered I shall not object to the postponement. I do not wish to crowd it down on anybody. But I have entered this motion. My only objection before to the bill for the admission of Colorado was in regard to this very matter of which I have been speaking. As to the alleged irregularity in their proceedings, that is nothing to me. Many of the States have been irregular, and the United States were irregular in the formation of their constitutions, but in the words of Mr. Madison, the vote of the people settled all those irregularities.

As regards the population and condition of this Territory, I have received a letter from Professor Whitney. Few men of the country possess the knowledge that he possesses in regard to California and all the Territories in the Rocky mountain region. He is thoroughly acquainted with this Territory of Colorado, and in his letter to me he says:

"I have witnessed the result of the late vote upon the admission of Colorado as a State with much regret, believing that her merits have not been fully known, and believing that reports respecting her population, &c., have been made which have been erroneous.

"The population of Colorado to-day is a more abiding one than ever before, and this summer will witness an emigration there greater, probably, than that of any other previous year. Our own State, Massachusetts, has probably more capital invested in Colorado to-day than any other State, and although you would hardly imagine it, there is scarcely a man of wealth and position in this city who has not some funds invested in Colorado. You may believe me personally interested when I assure you of my belief that Colorado is vastly richer in mineral deposits than any other section of our country, but such conviction in my mind is the result of personal acquaintance with the different mining sections of the country for which preëminent richness has been claimed."

He sends me also a work of his, in which he says of Colorado:

"She presents a region unequaled in its extent and of incalculable value; one that has all the resources and supporting auxiliaries of an empire, with water in abundance, and vast fields of coal and wood, and inexhaustible veins of gold, silver, copper, antimony, tin, nickel, lead, and iron; all of the essentials where-with to erect and build and pay for. Her agricultural resources alone are sufficient to attract immense immigration."

I find in a work by Mr. Bowles, entitled "Across the Continent," these words in regard to this Territory and what he witnessed there:

"Never was progress in wealth, in social and political organization, in the refinements of American home life, more rapid and more marked than in the brief history thus far of Colorado. Soon she will enter the Union as a State, holding not only the elements, but the acquired realities, of a noble and proud one, and contributing largely, as she has steadily done, even as a Territory, to the common profit of the nation. From the beginning Colorado has always sent more gold to the East than she has brought back in goods; and she is destined to be permanently a profitable partner in the household."

Toward the close of his book, on page 353, Mr. Bowles says:

"Looking back over our mining experience, and taking the average testimony of each district as equally reliable, I find myself impressed with the superior richness of the Colorado gold mines. Their ore averaged as uniformly $100 a ton, as that of Nevada, either Austin or Virginia, or of California does fifty dollars. The extraction is not as complete, because of the more intricate nature of the precious deposits; but means to overcome this, though perhaps at enlarged cost, seemed successfully initiated while we were there."

In view of the fact that we passed an enabling act for Colorado, and that we imposed no restrictions upon them in regard to their action; in view of the condition of that Territory, of its vast mineral wealth, and of the character of its population, I believe that its condition would be improved by admitting it into the Union as a State. As to this inequality of suffrage, we all know that it is wrong; we feel it now; and had we felt three years ago as we feel and see now, we should probably have inserted a provision in the enabling act of the Territory which would secure equality in this respect. I trust that such a provision will be inserted in all future enabling acts. I do not think that the admission of Colorado will commit us or embarrass us in any action that we may take in regard to other Territories or in regard to any of the States of this Union. I shall, therefore, give my vote for this reconsideration, and shall then be willing to postpone the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. There are other Territories which have enabling acts just like it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This, as I understand it, is a motion to proceed to the consideration of this subject for the purpose of reconsidering the vote by which the bill for the admission of Colorado was rejected. I hope that we shall proceed to consider the subject now. Gentlemen have been here claiming to represent a sovereign State as Senators for the last two or three months. The subject has been referred to a committee; a report has been made, and full debate had on the subject in the Senate, and I see no necessity for any further delay.

The reason assigned by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is that this is the anniversary of emancipation in this District, and of course we should not take up any subject of this kind upon this day. I certainly sympathize with the colored people of this District in celebrating their emancipation as much as the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator. I voted for that emancipation, and am proud of it. But I do not suppose that simply because this happens to be the day of that celebration, all public business should be delayed on that account. I do not know how many Senators desire to participate in that celebration. If those opposing the admission of Colorado desire to participate in that celebration, they will have, I trust, no difficulty in procuring a leave of absence for the day until this vote can be taken.

I am for the admission of Colorado. I voted for it before. Colorado comes in with the word "white" as a prefix to the qualifications for holding office and voting. I should prefer that that word had been left out, but it has not been left out in any single State organization of any Territory that we have ever admitted. I believe that there is no instance in the whole history of the admission of new States where that word "white" has not been the prefix to the qualifications for holding office and voting.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not time to begin?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is perhaps time to begin, but we should have begun when we passed the enabling act; and the vigilance of the Senator from Massachusetts should not have slumbered on that occasion.

Mr. SUMNER. It did not, as I shall show you presently.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If he desired such a restriction it should have been proposed then. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if it may not be considered irrelevant, whether he did not vote for the enabling act for Colorado; whether he did not vote for the enabling act for Nevada; whether he did not vote for the admission of Nevada; and whether precisely the same provision does not exist in the constitution of Nevada, which we admitted less than two years ago by a deliberate vote?

I think Colorado should be admitted for many reasons. They are a peculiar people, isolated some six or eight hundred miles from the waters of the Mississippi, and some eight or nine hundred miles, perhaps, from the Pacific coast. They have a peculiar mining interest, not common to the whole people of the United States. They think they require peculiar legislation, and that their legislation at home will be more adapted to develop their interests than legislation here at Washington. They think they have peculiar interests which should be represented here in the person of a member in the other House and Senators in this branch of Congress, and I can see no possible objection to it. I feel that we are committed. We authorized the organization of a State government, we imposed certain conditions, and we said if they would comply with these conditions they should be admitted as a State. They have substantially complied with every single condition, not exactly in the time specified in the act, but time is not of the essence of this contract. It is a continuing contract. We expressed our willingness to admit them upon certain conditions. They made one effort and failed. Upon the second effort they complied with all our conditions, and I see no possible reason why they should not be admitted, no reason resulting from the time at which the question is to be taken in the Senate, no reason resulting from the nature of the case. I think we should hail these new States, we should build them up as soon as possible; and there is another reason: the moment a State government is organized the Government of the United States is relieved from the burden of the territorial organization, and that whole burden is thrown upon the people of Colorado.

I understand, also, that there has been a great misapprehension existing in the minds of many Senators in reference to the number of people now in that Territory. A memorial has passed their Legislature memorializing Congress for the admission of their members, and stating positively that they have a population of fifty thousand. I doubt not a great mistake has pervaded the minds of Senators in reference to the number of the population.

But it is said they are not able to bear the burdens of a State government, and the taxation necessary to support the machinery of a State organization. They perhaps are as competent to judge upon that question as we are, and they think they are able to bear all those burdens. Another thing is true: ten thousand or twenty thousand or fifty thousand persons in a mining district are better able to support the burdens of a State government than a quarter of a million of people in an agricultural country. They are wealthy; they are continually developing the capital of the country; and they feel that their interests would be subserved by this organization.

Another reason, important and controlling with me, is that the people there have a loyal and sound State organization. They have come in here under our invitation, and I do not now propose to slam the door in their faces.

Mr. GRIMES. How far the opinions of Professor Whitney, of Mr. Bowles, ought to influence the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts upon a question of this kind is for him to determine. I think Professor Whitney, in his letter, if I did not misunderstand its scope, admits that he is interested in this subject, and seems to doubt whether or not the Senator himself would not think that his interest might preclude his giving a proper consideration to his statement. But I have always understood that we decided these questions, not upon the fact as to whether there was a certain amount of mineral resources in the mountains of a Territory, but upon the ground that there was human population enough in the Territory to support a State organization; and whatever may be the opinions of either of those distinguished citizens from Massachusetts on a subject of this kind, they would have very little influence with me.

The Senator says that he thinks he is bound by the action of the Senate, inasmuch as we have passed an enabling act authorizing these people to form a State constitution. We did. They made an effort to form a State constitution, but did not succeed. There was the end of that transaction; our enabling act was functus officio; it died the moment the other party refused to recognize the proposition that we laid down; and now we stand entirely uncommitted upon this subject. I understand that the Senator himself, in the latter part of his remarks, admitted as much as this when he spoke of the irregularities in their attempt to be admitted into the Union.

But the Senator says that his colleague did not object, or did not put any limitations upon the people of Colorado so as to compel them to send here a constitution that would not preclude colored men from voting. Why, sir, does not the Senator know that we have all made vast progress since 1863? Has not the Senator himself made vast progress since then? Have we not declared emancipation throughout the whole land? Are we to be governed by the same principles that we acted upon at that time? Now, what attitude are we placed in here? I think the Senator from Massachusetts will vote with me, whenever we shall get an opportunity, to allow colored people to vote under certain circumstances; and yet here he commits himself to the theory, in the face of the Senate and of the country, and he indorses it by his vote, that it is proper for a State to be admitted into the Union with a perpetual exclusion of all the colored people within the jurisdiction of that State from voting. Does it not strike the Senator as being somewhat inconsistent? With what sort of a face can he get up here to-morrow and insist that the people of the State of Virginia or the people of the State of Tennessee shall allow certain classes of the population in those States to vote when he says that it is competent and proper for the people of the Territory of Colorado to forever exclude the colored population of that State from voting? Mr. President, I do not consider myself bound by any past action of Congress to give so inconsistent a vote as that; and never, so long as I occupy a seat on this floor, will I consent to do it.

Now, with regard to the population in this Territory, everybody has the privilege to draw his own deductions from his own information on this subject, for we have not any official information in regard to it. Hitherto, when Territories sought to be admitted into the Union as States, there was an enumeration of the population. There has been none here. One man draws one conclusion from the facts that are presented to his mind, and another another. I draw my conclusion from the votes that have been given in the Territory at the regular annual elections from the foundation of the Territory to this moment; and taking that as a basis—and I think that it is the most accurate I can find—I come to the conclusion that there are not to exceed fifteen thousand people in the Territory of Colorado. Now, if you are going beyond this record, if you are going to accept the opinions of Tom, Dick, and Harry who may come here from Colorado, I will state what a gentleman told me—a very intelligent gentleman now of Montana, but formerly of my State, who left Montana in March, and who told me the day before yesterday that he believed there were six thousand of the citizens of Colorado then on their way to Montana and to Idaho.

Mr. SUMNER. I have heard the same.

Mr. GRIMES. And that he did not believe there was more than two thirds the population in Colorado at this moment that there was during the last winter. I do not ask anybody to accept that statement of the gentleman. I do not adopt it myself. It may be true or it may be false. I prefer to rely upon what is authentic, what we know to be facts, namely, the votes that have been given at the various elections in Colorado year by year, ever since she was erected into a Territory; and if there be anything like the same proportion of voters to population in that Territory that there is ordinarily in a Territory, then I am irresistibly driven to the conclusion that there cannot be to exceed fifteen thousand people in the Territory.

Now, sir, as I said the other day, I am not quite willing to say that a population of that size and of that description shall be entitled to come into the Senate and be represented, and have the same power in our deliberations as the State of New York or Ohio or Pennsylvania; nor am I quite willing to give such an inconsistent vote as I think I should be giving if I should indorse this constitution of the State of Colorado to-day, and then to-morrow come into the Senate under the leadership of the Senator from Massachusetts, and undertake to confer the elective franchise upon colored people in the selected States.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the question before the Senate, as I understand it, is on taking this proposition up; and the Senate will remember that in what I said I confined myself precisely to that point. I assigned two specific reasons why this matter should not be proceeded with to-day. I did not undertake, the Senate will remember, to go into the general question; I did not touch it. I made no allusion to the enabling act, no allusion to the population, and no allusion even to the constitution except so far as was needful to exhibit the glaring inconsistency of proceeding to recognize such a constitution on such a day as this. That was all that I said.

My excellent colleague, in reply to me, undertook to open the whole case. He has reminded you of the resources and the mineral wealth of Colorado. He has alluded to its population, and he has also invoked that ancient, departed, extinct enabling act. Had my colleague been in his seat when on a former occasion this question was amply discussed in all its parts, when that enabling act was exposed thoroughly, and it was shown that it had by no possibility any application to the present case, he would not have introduced that point; certainly he would not have introduced it by way of showing any inconsistency on my part, for on that occasion I fully met that suggestion and there was no one here to answer.

Why, sir, the Senator from Iowa has already told you that the enabling act had expired. I have it before me; I will not read it; Senators are familiar with it. It authorized certain proceedings to constitute a new State. Those proceedings were had and they failed, and the enabling act then and there failed and came to an end. All the obligations of Congress under that enabling act then and there ceased. That enabling act is at this moment of no value so far as this question is concerned; it cannot be cited; it is useless to read it. It is simply a record of a past consent given by Congress, which, however, failed to be acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 238.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will be allowed to proceed to finish his remarks on this subject, and that the other business will be laid over informally.

Mr. SUMNER. I should rather the other business should go on. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill No. 238 is before the Senate in the absence of any motion to postpone.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of this question.

Mr. CLARK. I can only express the hope that that will not be agreed to by the Senate, because it will be remembered that we had up the habeas corpus bill yesterday and proceeded with it to a considerable extent, and it was to come up in its regular order this morning, and I hope we shall be able now to finish that bill. When that shall have been done, I shall have no objection to any other bill coming up; but I do not like to have it interrupted in this way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] will allow a motion to be interposed here that the further consideration of the motion to reconsider (if that is up) be postponed until a day certain. It had better be fixed for some day next week, when it may be disposed of. If we continue the consideration of the Colorado question now, it will take the whole day.

Mr. POMEROY. My object was merely to take the vote on the reconsideration now, and then settle a time for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. The question of reconsideration will lead to debate. I am perfectly willing to allow it to be taken up for the purpose of fixing its consideration for some future day, but not to have the motion to reconsider discussed at this time. I am aware that that motion will lead to discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly it will.

Mr. CLARK. I was not here when the Colorado bill was up and considered by the Senate before, and I should not feel myself, though I do not wish to delay the Senate, like letting the vote be reconsidered without some opposition to it. But I do not urge that as a reason why it should not be taken up. What I desire is that we should keep to the order of business, and finish one thing at a time, and not lap one upon the other. If it can be taken up and assigned for some given time, when we can come at it considerably and with the understanding that we are to take it up at that time, I am entirely agreed, because that will facilitate the business of the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. If it can be taken up and made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, I am willing. I only want to dispose of the question.

Mr. CLARK. If it can be considered as the general sentiment of the Senate, that it may come up and be made the special order for some future time, I shall agree.

Mr. CONNESS. I intended this morning to vote for taking this subject up with the special view of postponing it until the beginning of the next week, when there will probably be a full Senate; and I think the whole Senate is agreed to that. I hope that will be done. It is not a matter of much consequence whether a reconsideration shall proceed to-day or not, if a day be fixed for its consideration. I hope the friends of the measure, or whoever has it in charge, will agree to fix its consideration for Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday of next week, when there will be a full Senate. I have objected to taking up this question for two or three days past, particularly while the Senator from Maine, who is ill, [Mr. FESSENDER,] is absent, because I knew that he felt great interest in the subject, and desired to be present when it is considered. I hope that a day will be named by those who have the measure in charge, say Tuesday or Wednesday of next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone all present and prior orders in order to continue the subject which was laid aside at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say in regard to this question that I have no disposition to crowd it, because a measure cannot be forced through here when a strong opposition manifests itself. I wish to accommodate myself to the Senate, and for that purpose I give notice now that on Tuesday morning next I shall renew this motion and adhere to it until we can reach a vote on it if possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the motion before the Senate. The motion before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Kansas to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the discussion of the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. That motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is not now before the Senate, and of course is not subject to be withdrawn by him.

Mr. POMEROY. I am willing to withdraw my motion if by common consent or by an arrangement we can agree to some day certain for the consideration of this subject.

Mr. WILSON. I am told by several Senators opposed to the bill that they are willing to take that course.

Several SENATORS. Let us fix a day.

Mr. WILSON. That is what I propose.

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to propose that by universal consent we now agree that this matter go over until next Tuesday morning, and that it be then taken up and made the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not now make it the special order for that time?

Mr. GRIMES. That is what I propose. My proposition is that the matter go over and by general consent be made the special order for Tuesday morning.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why not Monday?

Mr. SUMNER. No; not Monday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is very manifest that there are certain members of the Senate who are determined that this matter shall not be considered. The question now is simply on taking it up, and upon that motion, in disregard of what are the rules of the Senate, Senators have gone into a discussion as to the amount of population, and the Senator from Massachusetts has assumed that he showed that the law authorizing the people of Colorado to form a State government was defunct and should not be referred to and that nobody replied to it. I have no doubt he thinks so. I tried to reply to it in my feeble way. I tried to show him that in good faith Congress was committed to the people of Colorado by that law. Of course it did not amount to anything; but it is assuming a good deal to say that nobody attempted to answer at all.

Now, sir, the enemies of taking up this measure propose that you shall put it off for a week. Sir, let it come up now, and let us now make it the special order for some day when it can be considered, and not when we meet here next Tuesday be opposed again by the same arguments against taking it up at all. That is what we are met with to-day. The Senator from Massachusetts, who called the question up, gave notice that he had no desire to have action on the bill to-day. He wished to call the subject up; he had made a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate that it had on a former day, and this reasonable request to call up a measure which has the support, certainly, of quite a number of Senators, and, I hope, may have of a majority, is met by the objection that it shall not come up at all. And the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] tells us he has a speech to make. If he makes it he will make it out of order, for there is nothing in order on this question except simply suggestions as to the propriety of taking up the bill; its merits cannot be gone into.

Now, let us take up the bill, and let it be agreed to postpone it to the day named by the Senator from Iowa. He has made his speech; he has attacked Colorado on account of the population. I am prepared to show by a resolution of the Legislature of Colorado, adopted within sixty days, that they have got more than fifty thousand people—a solemn act of their Territorial Legislature—and the Senator says they have not but fifteen thousand. You may prejudice a case by that sort of argument when the question is not up. I hope the Senator from Iowa, if he is willing that we should consider the question at all, will let us take it up now and make it the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock. I believe everybody will agree to that.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Illinois, that those who are opposed to the passage of this bill are determined that it shall have no hearing, is uncalled for, is unworthy of him, and so far as I am concerned is not true. I have listened upon several occasions to the kind of lectures with which the Senator is so familiar, and which he is so much in the custom of delivering here in the Senate, but so far as they apply to me, I wish to inform him now that I am heartily tired of them, and I shall be exceedingly obliged to him if he will withhold them in the future.

Mr. President, what I said in regard to the population of Colorado I said in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who called up this measure, [Mr. WILSON,] and it was not volunteered by me. And so far as it relates to the memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado, if the Senator from Illinois, with all his acumen, can convince the Senate that it is possible for the General Assembly of the Territory of Colorado to memorialize and enact a fact of which they are as ignorant as we are, and convince us that we ought to adopt that statement, he will show a great deal more shrewdness and acumen than I have ever known him to exhibit thus far.

Sir, in perfect good faith I made the proposition that by universal consent this question should go over until Tuesday, and that then nothing else should be considered until it was disposed of, and I am, I confess, not pleased with the manner in which that proposition is met by the Senator from Illinois when he tells us that those, including all of us, who are opposed to the passage of this bill are unwilling that it should have a fair hearing in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have my ground of complaint against my good friend from Illinois. I do not mean to be very severe, however.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not give way.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rose only for the purpose of asking what is the question before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is on postponement, and I shall speak to the question, I assure my friend.

Mr. JOHNSON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor and does not yield it.

Mr. SUMNER. I said I have good ground of complaint against my excellent friend from Illinois. He undertook to answer what I never said; that is, he attributed to me something and then he found it very easy to answer. Now, sir, I never said that the argument that the enabling act was defunct was never answered on this floor. I said that the argument was made. I made it; others made it; the Senator from Iowa, many Senators, made it. I did not say that it was not answered. I remember well the effort of the Senator from Illinois to answer it. Whether he succeeded or not, I give no opinion. What I did say, however, was this: that on that occasion the suggestion was made, which my excellent colleague has made to-day, that I was guilty of an inconsistency; and I said that then and there I answered that argument. My colleague was not here, and he did not hear the answer, and therefore he has to-day without knowing the facts revived that charge of inconsistency. Holding the documents in my hand on that occasion I showed that the enabling act provided as follows:

"That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory, at the date of the passage of this act, shall be qualified to be elected; and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention."

That is, the electors, according to this enabling act, were the electors at that time, authorized as such by the territorial statutes. Holding the territorial statutes in my hand, I showed you that when that act was pending in the Senate of the United States, all persons, without distinction of color, were authorized to be electors. That was the answer that I gave before; that is the answer that I give now. Therefore, sir, I say that when I voted for this enabling act, I did not vote with any idea that there could be a discrimination founded on color; on the contrary, I voted with the positive conviction that all possibility of such discrimination was excluded; and still further, in that very enabling act I voted for this proposition:

"The constitution, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

Now, sir, I insist that the constitution which has been presented to us is not republican, and I further insist that it is inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence. My excellent colleague will certainly not maintain the contrary of that proposition. He will not say that a constitution which undertakes to exclude persons from their rights on account of color is consistent with the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Independence, and that, sir, is the very requirement of this enabling act for which I then voted. I insist that if you appeal to that enabling act you shall appeal to it not in any particular part, but in its whole. I appeal to it in that fundamental requirement that what is done shall be in harmony with the Declaration of Independence.

But, sir, I did not intend to argue the question. What I have said is merely in reply to my friend from Illinois. And now as to when we shall proceed with this question. If Senators think they ever should proceed with it, if Senators think that an effort like this to fly in the face of the Declaration of Independence, to fly in the face of those fundamental principles which we at this moment are striving to carry out through so large a portion of our country should be for a moment tolerated in this Chamber, then I am willing that you should fix a time to proceed with it. I think it ought not to be proceeded with at all. I think that the cause of human rights suffers every moment that you give to the consideration of the question. But I began the debate this morning by simply opposing your consideration of it to-day. If you choose to make a sacrifice of human rights do it on some other day than this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it seems that I have fallen under the animadversion of my friend from Iowa.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall say but a few words.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope my friend from Illinois will allow me to make a suggestion to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think there is one fact that has escaped the attention of my friend from Illinois, and that is a statement which was made by the Senator from Iowa when he made his suggestion. He proposed that this question should go over to Tuesday next, and be fixed by unanimous consent as the special order for that day. I think my friend from Illinois could not have heard that proposition, or none of this subsequent debate would have occurred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not so understand the Senator from Iowa. I understood him to propose that it should go over and be taken up at that time, and not now made the special order, as it could not be without taking it up now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Iowa distinctly to say, "fix it as a special order."

Mr. GRIMES. I did.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot make it a special order without first taking it up. The Senator from Wisconsin must be aware of that.

Mr. GRIMES. The proposition I made, and repeated twice, was that by unanimous consent it should go over and be made the special order for Tuesday morning, and be then proceeded with until disposed of.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That was as I understood it.

Mr. GRIMES. And the Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of this motion so understood me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed that when it went over we should have the same difficulty in taking up the matter on Tuesday that we find to-day; but it seems in the few remarks I made I fell under the very serious censure of both the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Massachusetts, and especially the Senator from Iowa. Now, sir, I never assumed to lecture anybody in the Senate, and least of all the Senator from Iowa. I should learn from him without attempting to teach him anything.

The Senator from Massachusetts thinks that I replied to the wrong part of his remarks. He understands that he made a statement which nobody replied to, and he reiterates it to-day, which was that when he voted for the enabling act he voted for an act which authorized all persons, without regard to color, to vote in the Territory of Colorado. Now, my distinguished friend from Massachusetts is laboring under a mistake himself, if he will allow me to say so. The truth about it is that the law of Colorado, when he voted for the enabling act, did not allow colored persons to vote. The statute of Colorado at the time the enabling act was passed confined the right of suffrage to white persons. The Senator from Massachusetts, therefore, when he voted for an enabling act that authorized the persons qualified to vote by territorial laws to form this State government, voted for an act confining the right of suffrage to white persons.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to correct him there?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUMNER. The date of the enabling act is March 21, 1864; it was then approved. My statement was, that when the Senate acted upon this enabling act all our information was that all persons in the Territory without distinction of color were electors, and we had before us the territorial statutes authorizing all to vote without distinction of color. Those statutes were altered eight or ten days before the approval of this act. I stated that on the former occasion in my remarks, and what I said was that when the Senate acted on this bill it was supposed that all persons, without distinction of color in that Territory, were electors. The alteration was made in that distant Territory between the action of the Senate and the approval of the act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was made before the approval of the act?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Whether the Senator from Massachusetts acted under a mistake of fact or not, I am not, of course, advised, except as he informs us. I presume he acted under a mistake of fact, as he seems to labor under one or two mistakes to-day in supposing that nobody tried to reply to this statement when he made it before. I think the same facts were drawn out then; and the Senator, I suppose, has not forgotten his vote in regard to the other Territories where the suffrage was confined to whites. I suppose he has not forgotten his vote for Nevada. Perhaps he acted under a mistake then in voting to admit Nevada, or for the enabling act for Nevada.

But, sir, these matters have very little to do with the consideration of the question before us; and I do not mean to be betrayed into any personal altercation with either of the gentlemen in regard to this question. I want to put it upon its own merits. I thought I saw manifested here a disposition to prevent this subject from being taken up. I did not have the Senator from Iowa in my mind so particularly as the Senator from Massachusetts who had in an informal manner announced that he had his speech ready.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no speech ready; I never said that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I beg pardon. I understood the Senator to say that he intended to speak against taking the matter up.

Mr. SUMNER. I began it, and I should have gone on if I had not been arrested.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call that a speech, for when the Senator "goes on" he always makes a speech. [Laughter.] It seems that the Senator from Iowa thought what I said was a reflection on him. Certainly anything of that kind was the farthest in the world from any intention of mine. I understand that there is no objection on the part of the Senator from Iowa, and I hope there will be none from the Senator from Massachusetts, that we make this subject the special order for Tuesday next. So far as I am concerned I am entirely satisfied with that. That can only be done by taking it up and then making it the special order for that time. I am quite willing that it should be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. POMEROY. If it can be done by unanimous consent, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. YATES. I rise simply to remark that I prefer the consideration of this question to-day for a reason directly the reverse of that which seems to animate the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I prefer that on the day that so many happy people in the streets of Washington are celebrating the anniversary of their independence we should set another star in the constellation of freedom. But, sir, I yield my objections and consent to the postponement.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me everybody is agreed in this matter, and there is no need of prolonging this controversy.

Mr. POMEROY. With the understanding that the question is to be taken up on Tuesday, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate is House bill No. 238.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I want to know if the Colorado bill is made the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that we postpone other orders for the purpose of doing that, and then it will be formally done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is renewed by the Senator from Illinois that the present and all prior orders be postponed in order to proceed with the consideration of the subject named by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CLARK. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator from Illinois not to move to postpone the bill now before the Senate, because then it will be away from the Senate, but to let it be laid aside informally without a postponement, and let the other question come up by unanimous consent and be made a special order, and then this bill will come up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that course will be adopted. I will not move to postpone, but I ask that the Senate by unanimous consent allow the bill in reference to the admission of Colorado to be made the special order for Tuesday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the bill now before the Senate be laid aside by unanimous consent and that the motion to reconsider the bill in regard to the admission of Colorado be taken up. The Chair hears no objection. That subject is before the Senate, and the motion is that the vote rejecting the admission of Colorado be reconsidered. That question is before the Senate. Will the Senate reconsider the vote?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move, in pursuance of the understanding, that that subject be postponed to and made the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, is now before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the first section of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought there was a special order for this hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a special order, but the unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of the special order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. Many Senators have left the Chamber, and this is an important vote. I hope it will not be taken at the present time. Senators have gone out for a few minutes, and I suggest that the Senate take a recess for a short time. [The procession of the colored citizens, in celebration of their enfranchisement, had attracted Senators to the balconies.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. They will be in, I suppose.

Mr. CONNESS. There is hardly anybody here to vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a quorum here, I think.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Send the Sergeant-at-Arms after the absentees.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let there be a call of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is never a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the roll will proceed on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, line twenty, at the end of the section to insert:

Or so far as it operates as a defense for any act done or omitted in any State represented in Congress during the rebellion and in which at the time and place of any such act or omission martial law was not in force.

Mr. CONNESS. I move, under the circumstances, that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No," "No."]

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NYE. I rise to make an inquiry whether it would be in order to make a motion before the vote is declared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion can be made while the Senate is dividing.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Cresswell, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wiley—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, and Wright—16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 19, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock M. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT COURTS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. MORRIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 134) to regulate the terms of the United States courts in the eastern district of New York, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The committee reported sundry amendments to the bill of a verbal character, which were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MORRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY OF A. H. STEPHENS.

Mr. BOYER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House of Representatives for distribution fifty thousand copies of the testimony of Hon. Alexander H. Stephens before the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend that resolution so as to make the number seventy-five thousand.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has gone, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late. The resolution has already been referred to the Committee on Printing.

DEPOT FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INSTRUCTION IN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. LYNCH, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide military instruction in agricultural colleges established under the act of July 2, 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, no; let us hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I will not object.

Mr. WHALEY. I learn that yesterday, during my absence, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EGLESTON] asked to have a letter read from a gentleman in the reporters' gallery, but the reading was objected to. I hold in my hand a letter from the same gentleman which I am informed by his friends he desires to have read to the House. That is my excuse for offering it, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

REPORTERS' GALLERY.
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 16, 1864.

SIR: I sincerely regret that I was not present to hear your eloquent, severe, and well-merited rebuke of some anonymous correspondent, who had the ill manners to intimate that you did not know the elements of the Latin language; and that what all now know you intended as a joke was in any sense considered as in earnest by yourself.

Will you do me the justice to state that I did not write the article you caused to be read, or procure its writing, or even know that it had been written, until the Gazette, in which it appeared as a selection, reached Washington?

You will at once perceive that the force of your remarks against the real offender will in no degree be broken by the correction which your own keen sense of justice and appreciation of the ridiculous will prompt you to make.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. V. N. BOYNTON.

HON. KELLIAN V. WHALEY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose the gentleman from West Virginia is satisfied, as I have no doubt the House is, of the good faith in which that letter was written.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the regular order of business.

PUBLIC PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow. This money is needed for the payment of the hands during this month.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman how the business of the House stands in regard to the ordinary appropriation bills.

Mr. STEVENS. With the exception of the Indian appropriation bill, all the general appropriation bills have been passed and sent to the Senate, and only one or two of them have come back. We have, besides the ordinary deficiency bill, which is always kept to the end of the session, only the miscellaneous appropriation bill back. All the other general appropriation bills have been reported to the House and they have all been passed with the exception of the Indian appropriation bill, which has been kept back in order that provision may be made for several new treaties.

Mr. ROSS. I object to the bill being made a special order.

The SPEAKER. A majority vote can make the bill the special order for to-morrow, it being an appropriation day. The Chair will put the question to the House.

The motion to make the bill a special order was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McRUER asked and obtained leave of absence for one week for his colleague, Mr. HIGBY.

ORGANIZATION OF THE PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports. At the close of the morning hour of yesterday the House had reconsidered the rejection of House bill No. 278, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in amendment of the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PERHAM. This bill has been pretty fully discussed, and I desire that it shall be put upon its passage now. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] will not do that. He himself proposed yesterday to have this bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I hope he will have the letter of the Secretary of the Interior upon this subject of salaries read to the House. I think the gentleman did not state to the House what that letter was.

Mr. PERHAM. I have seen no letter of the Secretary of the Interior upon the subject of this Pension Bureau.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I hope the House will understand that this is but a stepping-stone to raising the salaries of all these officers.

Mr. PERHAM. I think this House is as well prepared to act upon this subject as it ever will be.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a word.

Mr. PERHAM. Very well.

Mr. SPALDING. I would as soon vote to raise the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions as to raise the salary of any other officer; but I want to know if this is to be a stepping-stone to raising the salaries of all those officers. If it is, let us know it.

Mr. PERHAM. That question was asked yesterday and answered as fully as it could be.

Mr. SPALDING. I only desire that the House shall act understandingly upon this subject.

Mr. CONKLING. With the permission of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERHAM,] I desire to say that I voted yesterday in the first instance against this bill. I did it, I confess, without much knowledge of the bill, for I happened to be out of the House and unavoidably occupied otherwise when the explanation of the bill was made. I voted against the bill from my general opposition to the increase of salaries. For one, I have great respect for the officer whose salary is in question here. I believe him to be a very pure man and a very excellent officer; but if the gentleman from Maine will take the trouble I will thank him to state, for my benefit and for the benefit of others similarly situated who did not hear his explanation, what is the particular reason for raising the salary of this officer. If it is really a case of hardship, my inclination would be to go with him although I am generally opposed to raising salaries.

Mr. PERHAM. On the first day this question came up I presented, as fully as I could in the very brief period I occupied the reasons which governed the committee in making this recommendation. I stated the fact of the very large amount of business now before that bureau; that it had increased perhaps tenfold since the commencement of the late war. I also stated that the salaries of these bureau officers were formerly fixed at half the salaries of the Cabinet officers. The salaries of the Cabinet officers have now been raised to $8,000 a year, and we propose by this bill to increase the salary of this officer so that it shall correspond to the salaries of Cabinet officers, as it did before those salaries were raised.

I also stated the further fact that many other officers of the Government, heads of bureaus having much less work to do and much less responsibility, are receiving salaries equal to and in some instances greater than that which the committee propose to give to this officer. Those arguments are set forth more fully in the columns of the Globe than I feel willing to take up the time of the House in now stating.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Maine if the duties of the Second Auditor have not increased within a few years in a greater proportion than those of the Commissioner of Pensions. And the duties of the Third Auditor have also been increased. And I know that the duties of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs have been increased nearly twofold, in consequence of troubles among the Indians of late. The same reasons which operate in favor of increasing this salary will operate with equal force in favor of increasing the salary of every bureau officer of the Government. And if we increase the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, I do not see how we can refuse to increase the salaries of other officers. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has very well said, this is merely a stepping-stone to a general increase of salaries.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has written a letter explaining his views upon the question of raising this salary as well as other salaries in his Department.

No man in this House feels better disposed toward the Commissioner of Pensions than I do; and I have seldom given a vote with so much reluctance as that which I gave yesterday against the increase of the salary of this officer, because I am fully aware of his great merit and the immense labor he has to perform. I only voted as I did for the reason that I believed the increase of this salary would be a precedent for the increase of other salaries. If a letter from the Secretary of the Interior on this subject is before the committee, I believe it due to the House that the letter should be read. I have just this moment understood that there is such a letter. I ask my colleague [Mr. PERHAM] whether such is the fact.

Mr. PERHAM. I will state, in reply to my colleague, that no original letter from the Secretary of the Interior has come before the committee. There is before the Senate a proposition for the reorganization of the whole Interior Department, and in connection with that proposition a letter from the Secretary of the Interior has been communicated to the Senate. I believe that that proposition provides for a similar reorganization of the pension department to that originally proposed by this bill; in other words, it provides for an increase of the salaries of the higher grades of clerks in that department. A copy of that communication from the Secretary of the Interior was sent to me as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPALDING called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to inquire whether the bill as it now stands makes any change touching the salary of the chief clerk of the Pension Bureau.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 51, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Ekeley, Eggleston, Farguhar, Glossbrenner, Hale, Hayes, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Keiso, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marvin, McKuer, Morcour, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Newell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Plants, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rollins, Smith, Stevens, Strouse, Tabor, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Beaman, Boutwell, Bronwell, Broomall, Chandler, Conkling, Cook, Doring, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Anner C. Harding, Henderson, Edwin N. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kaykendall, Latham, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, McClurg, McKee, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Phelps, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Brundage, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Croft, Culloh, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dumont, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Ladin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Myers, Niblack, Nocil, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Seofield, Shunklin, Sloan, Starr, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, and Winfield—71.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. VAN AERNAM stated that Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, was confined to his room by sickness.

The result was announced as above stated.

SHIP-CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 344) entitled "An act to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara."

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman from New York yields to me; and I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill, and ask that it may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the substitute will be ordered to be printed.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] to yield to me that I may offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I cannot yield any further at present.

Mr. Speaker, owing to quite severe indisposition I will not this morning occupy the time of the House at any great length in discussing this measure: but after a few remarks, stating the objects and features of the bill, I will yield the remainder of my hour to several gentlemen who desire to be heard upon this subject. The bill is reported by the committee with several amendments which I propose the House shall act upon hereafter; and I reserve the right to conclude what I have to say when the previous question shall have been ordered, if the House shall see fit to order it.

Mr. Speaker, this is a measure of great national importance, and I propose to enter upon the discussion of the question in that light. This project has received the favorable action of the Government on several occasions in the past. Surveys for such a work have on several occasions been made under the direction of the Government by competent engineers. Reports of those surveys have been made, and are on file for the examination of all gentlemen who are interested.

Several years ago Captain Williams, one of the most distinguished of our engineers, made a survey under the direction of the Government for the construction of this work. He surveyed several routes and made his report. That survey and report were made in a time of peace. He said in that report it was a work of great military necessity, and that the Government should enter upon the construction of the canal as a military work. Of course we all admit it is a work of great commercial importance and benefit to the country. It is the only link wanted in the communication between the great lakes and rivers as it proposes to connect Lake Erie with Lake Ontario. Then we shall have a continuous line of communication from Lake Superior to Lake Ontario and the river St. Lawrence.

Now, sir, I am sorry to say that the chief opposition to this project comes from my own State. During the last few days some documents have been circulated and laid upon the desks of members, issuing from the canal authorities of the State of New York, urging upon the Representatives from that State to oppose the passage of this measure as being against the interests of New York. I say I am sorry the opposition to this great national project should come from my State. I have no sympathy with such opposition, and I take no part in it whatever, because I believe this is a measure of national importance and utility, and as a member of Congress legislating for the whole country, I am not disposed to throw obstacles in the way of such a measure although it may seem to some small extent to interfere with the interests of New York. Being a measure of great national importance and utility to all sections of the country, I think I should make no opposition to it.

What has been the position of New York in regard to the measure heretofore? On four or five occasions New York has gone in favor of this proposition. As early as 1798 a company was incorporated called the Niagara Canal Company, which looked directly to the construction of a ship-canal like that proposed by this bill. Again in 1823 the Legislature of the State of New York took similar action and again incorporated a company for the construction of this work. In 1858 similar action was taken; only recently, within the last two weeks, the popular branch of my State has passed a bill providing for the incorporation of a company to construct this work, by the large vote of 85 to 30. I am aware that measure failed in the Senate, or will doubtless be lost. I am not certain whether it has been lost in the Senate, but I understand it has been loaded with amendments to such an extent that its friends do not desire it to pass. Nevertheless, the popular branch of the Legislature, representing immediately the people of my State, has acted on the proposition, and passed the bill to which I have referred.

What does this bill propose? In the first place, it provides that the President shall appoint engineers who shall go upon the ground and make surveys and report their views, and upon those surveys and facts so reported he shall locate the route of this ship-canal. I may say there are several routes spoken of as desirable for the construction of this canal. The President is to locate the route after these surveys which will best secure the greatest benefit to the commercial interests of the country, and at the same time the greatest naval and military advantages.

It provides further for a commission which shall take into consideration the advantages derived from such a work and adjust the damages. The commissioners are to hear all cases that arise and settle them upon their merits.

After the route is thus selected the President is authorized to contract with any company that may be incorporated by any State, or organized in any State—in New York no more than any other State—for the construction of this work on the plan prescribed in the bill.

It further provides that this company shall proceed at a certain time with this work, and shall complete it within a given time, and that the Government shall loan bonds to the amount of $6,000,000 in aid of the construction of this work. The company is, however, to pay all the expense for survey and damages assessed up to the beginning of this work; but as fast as the company expends $300,000, upon the certificate of the engineers the Government is to issue $200,000 of bonds, and so on for every additional $300,000 expended, until the whole $6,000,000 of bonds are exhausted.

It further provides that ten per cent. of all the tolls received from this canal after paying the expenses and keeping up the repairs, is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, on the 1st of January in each year, to reimburse the Government for the money thus loaned.

And I may say here that the Government, in consideration of this, is to have control, so far as its own use is concerned, in all time to come, of this canal. It is to have the supervision also with reference to its being kept in good condition during the whole time it may be in possession of the company.

It further provides that the Government may at any time purchase this canal by paying to the company what it has expended in its construction, and in addition thereto ten per cent. on the actual cost of the canal, and take possession of it itself.

This is what the bill proposes. As I said before, this is a work of great national importance. There is now already a canal upon the Canada side, called the Welland canal, connecting the lakes. But three fourths of all the shipping of the upper lakes is American shipping. It is American enterprise which has built the Welland canal, and which keeps it up; and if we do not have a canal of our own on our own side there will soon be an enlargement of that canal, for measures are already taken to secure it, so as to accommodate the largest vessels that float on our lakes.

It is therefore a question whether we are to have the benefit of this great work, or whether Canada shall have it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right here.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Very well.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to know what benefit this canal will be to the American commerce after this large expenditure, so long as the control of the St. Lawrence river is with the English Government.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. It will be the same benefit to our commerce that the Welland canal now is.

Mr. TAYLOR. What benefit will that be since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I do not understand that the abrogation of that treaty deprives us of the use of that canal. In the year 1862 I understand that over thirty millions of commerce passed through the Welland canal into Lake Ontario, and more than three fourths of it went into American ports and did not go into the river St. Lawrence. We want a communication for the benefit of our commerce, and if we do not furnish this communication Canada will do it.

I repeat, that it is a question whether we shall control this commerce or whether Canada shall do it. The records of the past show very clearly that more than three fourths of all the commerce that has gone through that canal has gone into our ports, and not down the St. Lawrence river; and so it will be hereafter. And if such is the fact, while that canal is under the control of a foreign Government and while our commerce between the lakes is not under our own control fully, it becomes a very important question whether we shall not have a canal of our own on our own side over which we shall have entire control, and thus direct the trade through our own ports and to the benefit of our own citizens.

As I stated at the opening of my remarks, there are several gentlemen who wish to speak this morning; and, as I am very much indisposed and propose to discuss this measure hereafter, I yield to gentlemen who desire to speak. I yield now for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOULTON.]

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, in common with the people of the great West, I, as well as my State, feel a very great interest in this project; indeed I may say that for more than twenty years the people of the great States bordering upon the lakes have looked forward to the time when this great national work shall be completed, and have regarded it as absolutely necessary for their prosperity and the development of the States bordering upon those waters. And I will say here that there is no single question to-day in which the people of that part of the country which I have the honor in part to represent feel so great an interest as in the question now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy the few moments allotted to me in a discussion of the details of this bill. I believe they are substantially what are desired by our people, with a single exception, and that is that the bill provides that the depth of the canal shall be twelve feet. I think that the interests of the commerce of the West require that that canal shall at least be of the depth of fourteen feet, so that we can load a vessel at Chicago of twelve hundred tons and without breaking bulk convey the products of the West either to the eastern sea-board or to Europe.

Now, sir, the Government has contemplated this work almost ever since its foundation. It has been looked upon as an absolute necessity, at least in a military point of view. I shall make no remarks at this time as to its importance in that point of view. But no one who is acquainted with the topography of the western States, and the important connection that this work will accomplish, can doubt its great importance in that regard. It is to its commercial importance that I wish particularly to call the attention of the House at this time.

Before I do that, however, allow me to say a single word with reference to the power of the Government to construct works of this character. There was a time when the power of the Government to make appropriations for works of this character was disputed, but that time has long since passed by. The distinction is that whenever a work is national in importance and has reference to more than one State, connecting important navigable waters, as does this work, it may be regarded as entirely competent, and within the power of Congress under the Constitution, to make appropriations for the work. And such has been the practice of the Government upon this subject. Let me quote the language of President Monroe, touching the authority of Congress upon this point. Mr. Monroe said in reference to a work of a similar character to this:

"That Congress have unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense, and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit."

This construction of the Constitution was adopted by General Jackson, and I believe it has been the settled rule from that time to this with reference to works of this kind.

From the earliest period of our Government appropriations have been constantly made for the purpose of aiding in the construction of works of this character down to the very present time.

Now, sir, I hold it to be the duty of the Government to afford reasonable facilities for commerce between the States. How is it with reference to the western States to-day? I may say of those States that they are in their infancy as regards development. In the State of Illinois, not one tenth part of her area has yet been developed and cultivated; and the complaint of the great West to-day is that there are no sufficient facilities afforded to that section of country whereby the immense surplus products there raised can reach a market at reasonable expense.

It is conceded upon all hands, I think, that the Erie canal and the railroads connected therewith afford no adequate facilities for the transportation of the products of the West.

The value of the products of the West annually seeking a market in the East is more than five hundred million dollars.

There are over three thousand steam and sail vessels upon our western lakes, and all this immense commerce has to be crowded through a single channel to market, and we of the West are at the mercy of an overgrown corporation and monopoly.

Now, sir, the objections that are made to this work, as I understand the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN,] come principally from the State of New York. Now, what are those objections? Let us look at them for a moment. It is said that this canal would deprive the State of New York of a portion of its tolls and ruin and destroy the business of the Erie canal. Now, I do not admit that fact. And even if the completion of this canal should deprive that State of a portion of its tolls, is that any reason why this great national work should not be completed? The answers to this objection are:

1. The present canal and railroad connected with it cannot now do the business required by the growing interest of the West.

2. The West has been enormously taxed by these monopolies in New York, and has annually paid tolls to that State the sum of $10,000,000.

3. It saves to the West one hundred and fifty miles of artificial travel and about seventy-five cents on each ton of freight.

Besides, New York is estopped from setting up the plea that the completion of this great work will injure her canals and railroads, because, as has already been stated here to-day, the Legislature of that State has on two or three occasions, and also very recently, granted to a company the right to construct this very work, thereby yielding up that entire question so far as it may affect her existing railroads and canals.

This action of the people of New York concedes the fact that the construction of the ship-canal would not injure the other canals and railroads of New York. I would ask, what right has the State of New York to place herself in the highway of commerce and monopolize the tolls upon all the products raised in the West?

It is further said that the canals and railroads of the State of New York will be ruined and destroyed if this work is completed. Now, if in the infancy of the development of the West, so far as its productions are concerned, with hardly one fifteenth of the whole western country developed, these canals and railroads are insufficient to transport the products of to-day, how much more so would they be when the West shall be more extensively developed.

Sir, what are the benefits to the West to be derived from the construction of this canal? What is the great want of the West to-day? It is the want of facilities for transporting their products to market. In the first place, this ship-canal will enable us to load our products on vessels at the southern ports of Lake Michigan, in fact all around Lake Michigan, and upon Lake Erie, and from there to have them transported without breaking bulk at all, or more than once, to the eastern sea-board. It overcomes an artificial travel of one hundred and fifty miles, thus saving from seventy to seventy-five cents upon every ton of produce transported. And that amount is saved as well to the consumer in the East as the producer in the West. It will develop all the interest of the West, increase the value of all kinds of property, encourage immigration, and stimulate industry of every kind.

Another objection to this canal is, that it appropriates a considerable amount of money from the Treasury of the United States. The sum to be appropriated by this bill is only $6,000,000; a very small sum, indeed, when compared with the great advantages that are to be received from this expenditure. And besides, it is provided in the bill that this appropriation shall be reimbursed to the Government by reserving ten per cent. of the tolls as they shall subsequently accrue. But, sir, without the means for transportation the interest of the West will be paralyzed and its prosperity greatly retarded.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] has asked what advantage it will be to American commerce to construct a canal of this character. It seems to me that the advantages are so obvious that that question need not be asked. It enables us, as I have already remarked, to overcome at least one hundred and fifty miles of artificial travel, at a saving of at least seventy-five cents on each ton of produce transported. The gentleman says, however, that since the expiration of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and the British Provinces we will not have the use of the St. Lawrence river. It is true that we would not, independent of some arrangement with the Canadas, have the use of the St. Lawrence river below the town of Ogdensburg. We certainly have the right to the use of the river to Ogdensburg, for it is American waters that far.

Now, I assume that it will be for the interest of Canada to provide means and facilities of commerce to the great West through their canals. We pay tolls on the passage of our vessels through the various canals constructed for the purpose of overcoming the obstacles and obstructions in the St. Lawrence river. If we desire to ship to Europe the products which we load at Chicago, what objection would Canada have to allowing our vessels to pass through her canals, paying reasonable tolls, as they have done heretofore? Indeed, I am informed that Canada will afford every facility in her power for this purpose. She desires us to pass through her canals for reasonable toll.

But it is said that if that is done the State of New York would lose the benefit of those tolls. It is true she would to that extent. But I assume that in the future development of the productions of the West, there will be sufficient commerce from west to east to tax to the utmost every means of communication that can possibly be established between the West and the eastern sea-board for the next fifty years. To-day not more than one tenth part of the productions of the West can be taken to market for want of transportation. Thousands of bushels of corn have been used in the West for fuel during the past year, because it was worth less than other fuel and it would cost more than it was worth to transport it to market. What inducement is there for the western farmer to exert himself to raise productions that are of no value to him? The West to-day is overflowing with surplus productions of every kind which are comparatively valueless for want of means and facilities for market.

Now, sir, this canal will permit us to reach the city of New York almost without breaking bulk. We load at Chicago or at Detroit, and we take our vessels without breaking bulk to Ogdensburg at least, connecting at Syracuse with the Erie canal and thus reaching New York. It seems to me that it is the interest of New York to encourage this very work, whereby New York and the other eastern seaports may control the commerce of the West.

If you shut us out, and defeat this ship-canal, what will be the consequence? Either the West will be greatly retarded in prosperity or we must have the means to get our products to market; and if you do not afford us sufficient facilities for transportation through the State of New York by a canal of this sort, or by other proper means, you will compel us to seek transportation through the Canadas, whereby the benefits of the transportation of our commerce would be entirely lost to the State of New York and the citizens of the country and given to the Canadas.

If we cannot reach a market through New York on reasonable terms, we will provide other means, leaving New York out in the cold. The West can and should take care of her own interests. The best interests of the whole country demand the most unrestricted facilities and cheapest transportation for its productions.

When this is furnished no interest is destroyed or crippled, but the interest of all is promoted. The East and West by that canal will be more firmly united, and both parts of the country equally benefited and nobody injured.

The SPEAKER. The fifteen minutes of the gentleman from Illinois have expired.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, this measure was very fully discussed during the last Congress; and I am happy to have it in my power to say that this House, by a very decided majority, passed a bill similar in its features to that now before us, though for some reason the measure failed to receive the concurrence of the Senate.

Sir, I regard this measure as I have always done heretofore, as simply one of time; for I am satisfied that the imperious necessities of the great and growing West demand and will ultimately secure the construction of this canal around the falls of Niagara. There can be no doubt about that fact. No man representing here a district in the Northwest can at this moment venture to vote against this great measure, however much the intelligent members from the State of New York may insist upon their own policy of extending the capacities of the Erie canal.

I understand that the only objection offered by members from the State of New York is that this measure will interfere with the interests of the State along the line of the Erie canal from Buffalo to Albany. But, sir, the Erie canal cannot be made of sufficient capacity to accommodate the wants of the great West. We already transport from the upper lakes to the tide-waters of the East one hundred million bushels of wheat and corn. This quantity can easily be made one thousand millions if you will give us facilities for transportation. Growing as the West is in wealth and population, and hence in importance, how long can you successfully resist a measure of such vital importance to that section of the United States?

I put out of view at the present moment the question of the importance of this great work as a military necessity as a channel, in a time of difficulty with a neighboring Power, for the transportation of armed vessels from tide-water to the lakes, where we have so many flourishing cities, where we have such a growing commerce, and where we are now without any protection except a single gun upon a single vessel. Sir, at this moment we have upon the upper lakes—I speak now of the lakes above the Niagara falls—a fleet of water-craft connected with commercial operations equal to four thousand sail of vessels altogether. My own little city which within my own recollection had but fifteen hundred inhabitants, has at this moment a population of sixty-five thousand, and it has between three and four hundred vessels employed in this lake commerce. Our imports and exports within the last year would astonish gentlemen living in the East, if they do not know more than my friends from that quarter generally express themselves as knowing about our interests in the West. I say it would astonish them to know the amount of the exports and imports of the city of Cleveland, which does not pretend to compare with the mighty city of Chicago, away beyond us on Lake Michigan. The imports into the city of Cleveland for the last year were $117,582,984. The total of their exports was $96,572,137. Now, when you take into this account Detroit, Milwaukee, Chicago, with all the intermediate points on that long chain of lakes, what would you say to the imports and exports of the whole Northwest bordering on these lakes?

It is a confessed fact that the Erie canal, the Erie railroad, the Pennsylvania Central, all these great lines of communication now established leading from the Northwest to the sea-board, are not enough to take off our surplus products.

The SPEAKER stated that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. SPALDING. I am in favor of the passage of the bill.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield S. Hancock.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The fifth section was under consideration, having been amended so as to read as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the thirty-seven regiments of infantry, first provided for in the foregoing section, shall consist of those now commissioned and serving therewith, subject to such examination as the condition of their being retained in the service as is hereinafter provided for; and in making appointments to fill the original vacancies in the thirty-seven regiments thus provided for, and for a period of three years after the passage of this act, all first and second lieutenants and two thirds of the officers of each of the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be selected from among the officers and soldiers of volunteers who have served in the Army of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who have been distinguished for capacity, good conduct, and efficient service; but graduates of the United States Military Academy and enlisted men shall be eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in those regiments, as in the new regiments of cavalry, under the provisions of the third section of this act, and not otherwise; the Veteran Reserve corps shall be officered by appointment from any officers or soldiers of volunteers or of the regular Army who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States in the late war, or have been disabled by disease contracted in such service, and may yet be competent for garrison or other duty, to which that corps has heretofore been assigned.

The officers selected to fill original vacancies in the regiments of colored troops shall be taken from among those who have served as officers of colored troops in the Army of the United States in the late war. And all appointments of officers in the Veteran Reserve corps and in regiments of colored troops shall be made on examination, as hereinafter provided, having reference to capacity, good conduct, and efficient service in every case: Provided, That all officers of the existing Veteran Reserve corps, except those now actually detailed for duty in the Freedmen's Bureau or otherwise actually and necessarily employed, shall, upon the passage of this act, be mustered out of service and put upon the same footing with other disabled officers not now in service.

The pending question was upon the following amendment, submitted by Mr. DAVIS:

Add to the section the following: And it shall be lawful to appoint and commission as officers in any of the organizations authorized by this act any persons who have been distinguished for gallant and meritorious service in the Army of the United States during the late rebellion, and have been wounded or partially disabled therein while in the line of their duty: Provided, That disability arising therefrom shall be such only as if incurred in the regular service under officers' commissions would not incapacitate them from duty therein.

The previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered upon the section and pending amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I have conferred with the gentleman from New York in relation to his amendment, and considering it is general in its character, relating to all arms of the service, he agrees to withdraw it now and to offer it as a new section hereafter.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not feel disposed to obstruct the action of the House, but I should like to understand the reason for this sudden change.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] shall be permitted to withdraw his amendment. The section relates entirely to infantry regiments, and the amendment to all arms of the service. It is deemed improper to attach to a section applying to one particular arm of the service general legislation in reference to all arms. I prefer the amendment should be withdrawn now and moved as an additional section hereafter.

As to debate, there will be ample opportunity on each section. I do not propose to stifle side debate at all.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentlemen on the Administration side seem to wish that this matter should pass without debate. I will withdraw the objection.

The amendment of Mr. DAVIS was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will it be in order to offer an additional section here to come in immediately after this?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move it after the sixth section, not after this. An additional amendment incorporated in the bill is an amendment to the section immediately preceding.

Mr. TAYLOR. The amendment that I wish to offer comes in properly after the fifth section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it would be an amendment to the fifth section, and not in order, as that section has been passed from under the previous question.

Mr. TAYLOR. The object of it is to continue the pensions of all these officers and soldiers during the time they are in this service, and it therefore properly comes in here.

Mr. SCHENCK. I for one have no objection to its being offered here, but I do not give it my assent.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better go on to the next section.

The Clerk read section six, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the appointments to be made from among volunteer officers, under the provisions of this act, shall be distributed, as far as may be consistent with the interests of the public service, among the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, in proportion to the number of troops furnished by them respectively to the service of the United States during the late war.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the words "so far as may be consistent with the interests of the public service." I think there will be no difficulty in any State in finding enough to fill their quota, and therefore I would not leave it optional with anybody to make discrimination against particular States.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of order. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is on the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would like to get through this section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] can demand a division whenever a vote is required.

Mr. SCHENCK. The language proposed to be stricken out was put in by the committee simply because it might not be practicable to divide the proportion precisely by arithmetical calculation. If you should undertake to do so, you might have for one State or Territory an officer and a half or two thirds. If the gentleman will insert some words which will obviate the requirement for an exact division, so that one of our gallant men shall not be cut in two, I will assent to it. I have no objection, for instance, to distributing these appointments in the proportion stated as far as practicable.

Mr. STEVENS. I will modify my amendment accordingly. I move to strike out the words as before, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "so far as practicable."

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask for information from the gentleman who offered this amendment, or the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, what bearing this section will have upon the forces raised by the so-called loyal States from the States in rebellion. As I understand it, no States which, under the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau, and under the regulations of the service during the war, fitted out regiments which were called by the name of States in rebellion, will be entitled to the proportion under this section of officers for the troops which were actually raised for themselves, though nominally raised in the southern States.

For instance, during the occupation of Port Royal regiments of colored troops were raised there, and called the first, the second, &c., South Carolina regiments. Now, do I understand the effect of this section to be to give to the State of South Carolina a proportion of the officers to be appointed from officers of the colored regiments in this reorganization of the Army? I understand that to be the effect, and it may be the intention of the section.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA.]

Mr. ANCONA. As our friends on the other side of the House may be a little delicate about making a motion to adjourn on this occasion, I will do so for them. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS to strike out the words "as far as may be consistent with the interests of the public service" and substitute the words "so far as practicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Section seven was then read, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That each regiment of infantry provided for by this act shall have one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one adjutant, one regimental quartermaster, one regimental commissary, ten captains, ten first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, one commissary sergeant, one hospital steward, two principal musicians, and ten companies, and each company shall have one captain, one first lieutenant and one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, four sergeants, eight corporals, two artificers, two musicians, one wagoner, and fifty privates, and the number of privates may be increased to one hundred, at the discretion of the President, whenever the exigencies of the service require such increase. The adjutant, quartermaster, and commissary of a regiment shall be an extra first lieutenant, appointed for their respective duties.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to strike out the words "two artificers" in the clause relating to the organization of the companies. I make the motion more for the purpose of asking the members of the Military Committee what are the duties of these artificers, especially in the infantry regiments.

Mr. SCHENCK. This provision has been made in accordance with suggestions by the military council that assembled here, comprising Generals Meade, Sherman, and others. It was urged that at least two men in each company should be skilled artificers. That would constitute for each regiment what might be termed a corps of pioneers to aid in building bridges, and doing all other duties appropriate to such service. And we thought it not inappropriate to allow that number to each company, according to that suggestion. I think myself it is a good provision.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Would not the same propriety require ambulance men?

Mr. SCHENCK. It might or might not be. They are connected with the surgical department, and can be detailed for that service.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. And these artificers are connected with the quartermaster's department, and can be detailed as well as the others.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is always something for artificers and pioneers to do in time of peace, about forts, &c. And I trust we shall for a long time be in such a condition that we shall not require ambulance men.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] what reason there is for the last clause of this section? That clause is:

The adjutant, quartermaster, and commissary of a regiment shall each be an extra first lieutenant, appointed for their respective duties.

I am not sufficient of a military man to be an authority, but I suppose we have not hitherto had any extra officers for the purpose of doing these duties.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose we better dispose of one amendment before another is offered.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I desire to move to amend this section by striking out the words "regimental commissaries."

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order, pending the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will withdraw my amendment for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] to offer his amendment.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out of this seventh section the words "regimental commissaries." I do so because I deem the office of regimental commissary entirely unnecessary and useless. In the history of this country, ever since the first organization of armies, there is to be found no instance of such an officer being employed as the commissary of an infantry regiment. There has been developed in time of peace no necessity for any such officer; nor in time of war, during the war of the Revolution, the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, and the great war of the rebellion through which we have just passed. And now, when we are organizing our Army upon a peace establishment, I can see no necessity for creating officers to do no service whatever that cannot be done by those we now have.

There are to be fifty-five regiments of infantry, according to the organization proposed by this bill, each regiment to have a commissary with the pay of a first lieutenant. According to the bill proposed to establish the pay of the Army, a first lieutenant is to receive $1,500 a year as pay proper. In addition to that, this commissary is to receive $120 a year for responsibility money. In addition to that, if you look at the next section of the bill, he is to be a mounted officer; that means nothing more nor less than that the Government shall furnish forge and shoe his horse, which will be an additional expense of at least ten dollars a month to the Government. That will make the cost of one of these officers $1,740 a year. When multiplied by the number of regiments provided for, it makes the expense levied on the over-taxed energies of the people $95,700 a year for no purpose whatever, because this same service has been performed through peace and through war by commissary sergeants, who have twenty-one dollars a month. The bill does not do away with the commissary sergeant at all, but continues him and makes this an additional office.

As I said before, the whole expense in these infantry regiments will amount to $95,700 a year. And not only that, but we are creating a tax on the labor of the country to continue for all time. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I believe that in time of peace the number of the officers of the Army should be reduced as low as possible, and that all useless officers should be dispensed with. In this case, during the war, when we have had marches of extreme length, it has sometimes been necessary to detail an officer to act as regimental commissary, but it was only in extreme cases that such was the case.

Now, you will hardly find a single regiment stationed as an entirety at one post, and the post commissary distributes rations to the company at the post. I can see no use of a regimental commissary when you have a quartermaster who, during the war, has done this duty and done it well. This bill proposes, at the enormous expense of $95,000 a year, to add another officer to each regiment. Instead of reducing the expenses of the Army, we are proposing to add an officer to each regiment at an expense of $95,000. I am opposed to any such motion unless there can be some good reason shown for the increase.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think that the only motive that the committee had in adopting this provision was this: it has been thought by many, both in time of peace and in time of war, an imperfection in the system that one officer should combine in himself two characters, and thus mix his accounts, being responsible to two different departments, the Quartermaster General's department on the one side and the commissary department on the other. Therefore, in following the recommendation made by the principal officers of the Army, who sat in council upon all these subjects, the committee assented to an arrangement by which the two distinct offices should be created in the infantry as in the other arms of the service.

The difficulty is obviated to some extent by having a commissary and a quartermaster sergeant. I am not disposed to insist, myself, very strongly upon this provision for an additional officer. I am willing that the House shall decide the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Will the gentleman tell me how it happens that in only one branch of the service an officer of this kind has been found necessary?

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I think it is as necessary in one as in the other. It is questionable whether the office is necessary in one arm of the service or in the other. I trust the House will come to a vote.

The question was taken on Mr. VAN AERNAM's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move to strike out, in lines four and five, the words "ten captains, ten first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants."

The section already provides, in regard to these regimental officers, that each company shall have one captain, and one first, and one second lieutenant. This is only a repetition. These officers are provided for in the regimental organization.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In order to perfect the section, I move to strike out the word "commissary" in the fourteenth line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out, in line eleven, the words "fifty privates" and to insert in lieu thereof "one hundred privates."

The object of creating an army is to have one that will be of some practical use. I have no hesitation in indorsing the letter which was presented from Generals Grant and Sherman, and other general officers in the field, asserting the fact that there are always in field operations thirty per cent. of the men sick. I think those military men have understated the fact. My experience as a medical officer in the Army would lead me to believe that fifty per cent. of men are disqualified by physical disability, whether during actual campaigns, or on ordinary duty. In October, 1862, I landed here with a regiment of five hundred and sixty-two enlisted men. We were sent to the army of the Potomac; we were engaged in no active campaign, in no battle; the regiment suffered from no epidemic disease, no disease of a contagious character. Yet just seven months from the day when we arrived here at Washington we went into the battle of Chancellorsville with four hundred and thirty-eight enlisted men. The regiment had been depleted to that extent during those seven months, though we had no active campaigning, and were not subjected to the casualties of battle or to contagious or epidemic disease.

My observation leads me to the belief that what was true of that regiment was true of all the new troops that entered the Army in 1862.

Supposing that to be the fact, I submit that, if we put in the field companies numbering only fifty men each, they will at the end of six months have dwindled down to companies of twenty-five or thirty—thirty at most, probably twenty-five, perhaps not more than twenty; because, sir, the volunteer organization of the Army was not depleted to any great extent by desertions; but this is not a fact in regard to the regular Army, in which desertion has been a crying evil, order after order having been issued for the arrest of deserters from the regular Army.

Now, supposing that there should be a diminution at the rate of forty per cent. in seven months, as there was with the troops furnished in 1862, we should, under this bill, have our companies reduced in a period of half a year to twenty-three or twenty-four men. Thus our Army would become a great skeleton without any vital organization fitting for performing efficiently the functions of an army. Such an army would simply eat the substance of the people without rendering any valuable service.

I submit that, as it is contrary to the spirit and habits of the better part of our people, including the agriculturists and the sons of agriculturists, to enlist in the regular Army, it would be impossible, under the circumstances, to keep these companies full. I have seen a note from the Adjutant General's Office, stating that between October, 1864, and January, 1866, there had been only about thirty-nine thousand men enlisted into the regular Army.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The bill, as it stands, provides that the number of privates in a company may be increased to one hundred, at the discretion of the President. Does the gentleman offer his amendment because he cannot trust the President?

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I offer the amendment because I believe it improper to allow a company to be organized with less than one hundred men. If you allow companies to be organized with a smaller number, your Army will be a mere skeleton without any muscle. You will have an army composed simply of officers and drummers—an army that may be fitted to illustrate the "pomp and circumstance of war," but which will be incompetent for efficient service in any exigency.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have very little to say in regard to this amendment. But I deem it impolitic and certainly not economical to keep the Army all the time up to its maximum. The effect of the gentleman's amendment, striking out "fifty" and inserting "one hundred," would be to keep the companies all the time at their maximum. It would organize at once an Army of eighty thousand men. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, if he will permit me, whether the effect of the bill would not be to increase the number of regiments just one half, and thus increase in the same proportion the number of officers?

Mr. SCHENCK. It would not have that effect without further regulations.

Mr. FARQUHAR. If you make a company consist of fifty, instead of one hundred, do you not thereby increase the number of officers just one half?

Mr. SCHENCK. The officers are the same. The expansion is to be by filling up the regiments as occasion may require, but to keep the Army down to the lowest practicable point with regard to numbers in time of peace.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I desire to say a word or two in addition to what I have already said on this subject.

It has been demonstrated, during this rebellion, that our people are not much inclined to enlist in the regular Army; they prefer to enlist in volunteer organizations. In reference to the organization of this Army, I would consult the views of the Secretary of War and the Lieutenant General, and allow them to have just as many men in the field as they may think necessary and proper, with regard to the exigencies of the service and the condition of the country. But I would not allow organizations to go into the field in a skeleton capacity. The effect would be you would have a full quota of officers all the time, but you would not have the men to do the duty. You want a company of one hundred men to garrison a fort, take care of the guns and other public property. If you put these skeleton regiments into the field you will have to take four companies to make up these one hundred men, while you will have fifteen or sixteen officers to pay instead of two or three.

I apprehend it is not a matter of economy. It is not just to the people of the country to keep up officers when there are no men to perform the service. If fifty thousand men be needed let them be furnished in full companies and not in skeleton companies. I tell you if you adopt the provision for these skeleton companies, you will have an army of officers and musicians and no one to do duty.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question recurred on Mr. VAN AERNAM'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 83, noes 86; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 65, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Sidney Clarke, Collioth, Conkling, Dawes, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Grier, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hulburd, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Niblack, Perlman, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Seaford, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Srouse, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William D. Washburn, Windom, and Wright—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Dixon, Driggs, Eggleston, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Hale, Hayes, Hogan, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Choster D. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Julian, Kasson, Ketcham, Kaykendall, Latham, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClure, McKuer, Moulton, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Phelps, Price, Ritter, Rollins, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bergen, Bidwell, Blow, Brandegee, Cobb, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawson, DeGreese, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eekley, Eldridge, Eliot, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Ladin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Newell, Noell, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Sulwell, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—73.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries of infantry regiments shall be mounted officers; and that all regimental adjutants, quartermasters, and commissaries shall be paid, in addition to their other proper allowances, as first lieutenants and mounted officers, ten dollars per month, as compensation for their greater care and responsibility; and officers of the line detailed to act as regimental quartermasters or commissaries, or as quartermasters or commissaries of permanent posts, or of commands of not less than two companies, shall, when the assignment is duly reported to and approved by the War Department, receive as extra compensation while responsible for Government property, ten dollars per month.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out the word "commissaries" in the second and fourth lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out after the word "officers" in the third line, these words:

And that all regimental adjutants and quartermasters shall be paid, in addition to their other proper allowances as first lieutenants and mounted officers, ten dollars per month, as compensation for their greater care and responsibility; and officers of the line detailed to act as regimental quartermasters or commissaries, or as quartermasters or commissaries of permanent posts, or of commands of not less than two companies, shall, when the assignment is duly reported to and approved by the War Department, receive as extra compensation while responsible for Government property, ten dollars per month.

I do not see why these officers should have an easy time in comparison with the officers of the line.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I should be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] if it did not render the section incongruous with the general scope of this bill. The section proposes to increase the number of officers and the expense of the Army without increasing its efficiency.

It is provided in this bill that these quartermasters and adjutants, when they have any public property in their possession, shall have ten dollars extra because of the responsibility which is devolved upon them. Now, what in Heaven's name has a quartermaster to do but to take public property and take care of it? There is not a regiment in the service to-day but what can find forty capable privates who have served for years who are competent for that position and who would be glad to obtain it. There is scarcely a wounded volunteer in the Army that is not capable of performing, in time of peace, all the duties and responsibilities which devolve by military law upon the office of quartermaster or adjutant. They are both very genteel berths, much sought after by young men of distinguished families. They are soft places, and can be made use of to get glory without danger.

Now, sir, except so far as I may feel bound to keep up the principle of this bill, and make it what it is designed to be, I shall not vote for a provision for the benefit of gentlemen who have political influence enough to get into the Army to live easy. My policy would be to have simply an efficient army for police duty in time of peace, and not have an officer or a man beyond the actual needs of the service. I would not create a standing army in anticipation of a war in the future. It is the last source to which I would look for security to liberty or law. A standing army is the engine and contrivance of monarchy and tyranny. It is the school in which despotism is learned; and if you keep up a large standing army in this country for a few years, schooled as standing armies usually are, you will find a large overshadowing institution, which is alien to the sentiments of freedom, virtue, and intelligence in the people.

Sir, I recollect at the beginning of the late war that a large proportion of the Army which we had nourished and educated, as we supposed, in harmony and sympathy with the great sentiment which has since put down that rebellion, deserted our flag and went over to the enemy. Notwithstanding their discipline and education at West Point they turned against this country. And those who remained in some instances and performed good service in the field, hesitated, if we are not misinformed, as to which side they should take.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman know of a single enlisted man in the old Army in 1861, or thereafter, who deserted and went over to the rebellion? And were not the desertions he speaks of confined wholly to officers?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Yes, sir. If I used that language I retract it. Not many of the enlisted men, I believe, deserted.

But, sir, I wish to say this: that if in the future our country encounters difficulties by reason of insurrections at home or by collision with nations abroad, our reliance will be upon the patriotism and intelligence of the people for the preservation of a Government which is a blessing to those people, a Government which does not burden them with the incubus of a standing army, making them discontented and indisposed to fight for its preservation. I will undertake to say that if we should ten years hence have a war, it would be better and more cheaply provided for and maintained by issuing a proclamation to the freemen of this country to come forth and fight the battles in the interest of freedom and good government than by keeping up a standing army in anticipation of such an event. Hence I do not believe in the policy of providing a large standing army, and keeping it up for ten, twenty, or thirty years, for the purpose of being prepared for war. I want no great horde of officers to eat out our substance. And whatever may be the purpose and object of the bill before us, its effect, I fear, will be to create a large number of officers and to make an inefficient army. To that I am opposed.

I am willing at all times to give employment to the volunteer officers who have been serving their country during the late war, whether they happened to be wounded or not, by giving the preference to them in the selections for the public service. I am willing that they shall be employed almost exclusively in doing garrison and other light duties, which are the only duties required to be performed in time of peace. These are my general views, and I shall vote to reduce the Army to thirty thousand, or at most, forty thousand men.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire of him if he would have those thirty or forty thousand men organized in regiments of a thousand men each, or would he have twice that number of regiments?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I would have only thirty or forty full regiments if it was not incongruous with the bill. But I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] with the hope that the rest of the bill would be made to conform to it.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Would not the gentleman from Illinois deem it advisable to perfect the bill in the best possible manner, and in the end recommit it, if necessary, to do what the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. SCHENCK] yesterday called "to lick it into shape?"

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. There is no trouble in reducing this bill to the shape the gentleman indicates. But I obtained the floor on the condition that I opposed the gentleman's amendment, and therefore I speak as if advocating the bill in its present shape.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquired if the gentleman intended to oppose the amendment merely for the purpose of equalizing the debate. The gentleman can speak for or against the bill, as he pleases, having obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has referred to the generals of our armies as the authority for determining the number of troops required in time of peace. Now, we must all remember that there is some human nature in all of us. It is quite natural for the men who command the armies of the United States to desire that our Army shall make a decent show in the world; that it should at least dignify the offices they hold in connection with it. And I think myself that the policy of this bill is to make a brilliant army, one that will accord with the characters and brilliancy of the generals in command of it.

If we had a different form of government I might "go in," as the saying is, for an army of half a million men, one able to make a show before the monarchs of the world, one able to control by force the people of this country who now claim the right of self-government. But under our form of government we depend upon a virtuous and intelligent people, devoted to a support of the Government which pleases them in every respect, and which makes their yoke easy, and their burden light. Take away that resource for the protection of liberty and a free Government and you will find no protection in a standing army. It is schooled in the school of the tyrant and the monarch, and if it does not ultimately become alien to liberty and democracy, it will prove very different in this country from what it has ever proved elsewhere.

I will ask my friend from Wisconsin [Mr.

PAINE] if a regiment, according to its ratio of the cost of an army will not cost the Government about a million dollars a year.

Mr. PAINE. I am not able to state the exact amount a regiment will cost the Government.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I think that is about the cost of a regiment, taking in consideration all the pay and expenses of the officers. And more than half that expense will be incurred whether there are any privates in the regiment or not. The pay of the officers, the very machinery necessary to keep up the organization of the regiment, will cost the Government more than half that sum. Now, why should the people of this Government be taxed $80,000,000 a year for this Army? For whose benefit and for what purpose? Is it to keep down the people of Illinois? We require no such repression in that State. Is it to keep down the people anywhere in this broad country? No, sir; a virtuous public opinion is all that is required for that purpose. If you will give me one division of cavalry and one division of mounted infantry I will undertake that Grant will do the job of preserving quiet all over the Union.

Mr. PAINE. I have but a single word to say in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN AERNAM.] I have the highest respect for his opinion concerning this bill generally, and I am unwilling to express an opinion differing from his unless absolutely compelled to do so by my own convictions. But my observation has been that the old rule which prevailed in the regular Army when the war broke out, and which has prevailed ever since, whereby regimental quartermasters and adjutants always received ten dollars a month additional compensation for their increased responsibilities, was a rule founded in justice. I believe it is not true, as the gentleman seems to suppose, that these officers, the regimental quartermasters and adjutants, have light duties to perform compared with those that devolve upon the lieutenants of companies. On the contrary, my observation in the Army satisfied me that no officer in the Army was more severely worked than these regimental adjutants and quartermasters when they did their duty. I am not unaware that that duty is sometimes left unperformed, but I undertake to say that the post of a regimental adjutant or quartermaster, who is faithful to his duty, is no sinecure. The duty which devolves upon him is very much greater, and the responsibilities of his position are very much graver, than those which devolve upon the lieutenant of a company; for when the march was ended and the lieutenant of a company could lie down to rest, then the work of the regimental adjutant or the regimental quartermaster began; and it oftentimes lasted until morning came, and the column was ready to march again.

Now, sir, knowing that the labor and the responsibilities of these men are so much greater than those of the lieutenants, I am disposed to continue this provision—a provision which existed before the war, and has continued during the war—in this new Army bill. I am therefore opposed to the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York will not prevail. I do not desire to add anything to the reasons which have been given, drawn not only from practice, but from propriety, by the gentleman from Wisconsin who has just taken his seat; but as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] has referred, as others have done in the course of this debate, to the immense cost of an army, and have overstated it exceedingly under a misapprehension, in consequence of not looking very closely into the figures, I desire to make a statement to the House.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for information.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will endeavor to give it to the gentleman. I have here the calculation of the pay proper and allowances for clothing and rations of a regiment of infantry, and the pay proper and allowances of its officers, and I find that when you add the pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men together it amounts to $128,872 19 a year. In this is not included the allowance for forage or fuel, which are drawn in kind. Of course the forage does not amount to much in the infantry, and while fuel is allowed at posts and in cities the amount is not a large one, except in the case of detailed officers on duty in cities like Washington.

Let me make the general remark that in speaking of regiments, I refer to regiments composed of fifty-five privates, artificers, and officers, the minimum organization provided for here, and not of a regiment expanded to its full number of one hundred. The additional cost in that case would be something like seventy thousand dollars in time of war, the number of officers being the same.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Does that calculation include clothing?

Mr. SCHENCK. It includes clothing, rations, and everything.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Does it include arms?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. If the gentleman were a little patient, which no gentleman here seems to be, I was going to advance to that point. This is a specific estimate; a specific account of what is necessary to support one of these organizations.

But then an army implies bureaus, and officers detailed for duty there, commutation of quarters, artillery, horses for cavalry, and numberless other expenses in the various departments, quartermaster's, commissary's, &c., which must also all be estimated for in providing for keeping up a military establishment. Now, we happen to know what will be the aggregate annual cost of just such an army as is here proposed. It will be in round numbers $33,000,000, (I can give the exact figures, if any gentleman desires them,) without any of the reductions from the bureaus and elsewhere provided for in this bill. There are seventy-two regiments provided for, including artillery, cavalry, and infantry; and the expense of the whole seventy-two regiments, with all the artillery and all the cavalry, and all the extensive bureaus, and all the munitions of war, including powder, lead, and all else that may be required to put an army in fighting order or to keep it in time of peace in a condition ready for fighting, is but $33,000,000. How, then, is it possible that each regiment, and particularly each one of the infantry regiments (not half so expensive as cavalry regiments) shall cost half a million dollars per annum?

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That each regiment in the service of the United States may have a band, (as now provided by law,) and there shall be one ordnance sergeant and one hospital steward for each military post, and the same number of post chaplains as now provided by law; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint for each national cemetery now established, or that may be established, a superintendent, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of an ordnance sergeant, to be selected from among those who were non-commissioned officers of volunteers in the Army of the United States in the late war, and who have served faithfully and been disabled while in the line of their duty.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend by striking out, after the word "that" in the first line, the words "each regiment in the service of the United States may have a band, as now provided by law," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Twenty bands, and no more, may be retained or enlisted in the Army, with such organization as is now provided by law, to be assigned to brigades in time of war, and in time of peace to assembled brigades or to forts or posts at which the largest number of troops shall be stationed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that such an amendment as this ought to be made. The provision during the war was for brigade bands for volunteers, the regular Army having regimental bands. I incline to think that the drum and fife are about the best of music; but still bands have their use with others who have more musical taste than I. These bands seem to have a very inspiring effect at posts and with brigades or larger bodies.

I have no objection to the amendment, if it be so modified as to provide that these twenty bands shall include the band at West Point.

Mr. PAINE. I accept the suggestion, and modify my amendment by striking out after the words "twenty bands" the words, "and no more," and by inserting in lieu thereof these words: "including the band of the Military Academy."

Mr. SCHENCK. As it now stands the provision will be for twenty bands only, instead of a band for each regiment of the Army. Inasmuch as the band at West Point is now provided for I move to amend the amendment by adding at the close the words, "and the band at the Military Academy shall be placed on the same footing as other bands."

Mr. PAINE. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have offered this amendment for the reason that the cadets at West Point are now taxed twenty-five cents each per month to support their band. I see no reason why that deduction should be made from the pay of those young gentlemen. As that is an important military post, the headquarters of the Engineer corps, the band at that place should be put on the same footing as the bands of all other organizations of the Army.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin so as to make the number of the bands "seventeen" instead of "twenty." This will furnish a band to each of the generals in the service, and also a band for West Point.

These bands, Mr. Speaker, are a very expensive luxury. A paymaster in the service of the United States figured out for me this morning the monthly pay of a band, and it amounts to $968. If these regimental bands be continued we shall incur an expense of more than half a million dollars a year for this extra music. I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in thinking that the drum and the fife are the only and the true martial music. As that kind of music is already provided in the organization of the company, and of the regiment, I see no necessity for a greater number of bands than seventeen. By reducing the number of bands it would reduce the expenses $3,000 a month.

Mr. PAINE. I have no objection to reduce the number of bands to seventeen, but I should be sorry to place the amendment upon the same ground upon which he places it. I should be unwilling to graduate the number of bands according to the number of general officers. I see no connection between them. At the same time I admit the number of bands should be as small as possible consistent with the good of the service. Therefore, but not for the same reason which the gentleman gives, I accept the proposition to reduce the number of bands to seventeen.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. The gentleman from Wisconsin has mistaken me when he alleges that my idea is to graduate the number of bands by the number of general officers. My idea is to give a band to each unit. A brigade is a unit and is commanded by a brigadier general. I do not propose to furnish a band simply because a man is a general in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the Army shall hereafter be for the term of three years, and that but two field officers shall be appointed to any regiment until six companies of the regiment shall have been organized, and that but two officers for each company shall be appointed until the minimum number of men has been enlisted and the regiment duly organized; but recruits may at all times be collected at the general rendezvous in addition to the number required to fill to their minimum all the regiments and companies of the Army: Provided, That such recruits shall not exceed in the aggregate three thousand men. It shall be competent to enlist men for the service who have been wounded in the line of their duty while serving in the Army of the United States, or who have been disabled by disease contracted in such service: Provided, It shall be found, on medical inspection, that by such wounds or disability they are not unfitted for efficiency in garrison or other light duty; and such men, when enlisted, shall be assigned to service exclusively in the regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out "three" and to insert "five," so as to make the term of enlistment five years instead of three.

I have not heard the reasons of the chairman of the committee, and although I would prefer to hear them before speaking to my amendment, I will yield to him or go on my self now.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will follow the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I regard it as one of the greatest evils that the Army of the United States, even in the revolutionary war, the war of 1812, or in the late war, has ever been obliged to encounter, that is, these short terms of enlistment. It almost ruined us in the revolutionary war. It was almost equally damaging to the interests of the country in the war of 1812. Every one knows how terrible was the result in making the terms of enlistment so short during the late war.

Ohio, when the first call was made for troops, had eighty-two thousand men offered to the Government, and they would have been offered for five years or during the war as well as for three months if called for that time, but we were only authorized to receive them for three months. The consequence was that by the time we fairly got the troops into the field they had to be mustered out. We raised twelve months' troops, and nine months' troops, and we were even guilty of the folly at one time of raising hundred days' men. I know they did good service. It was a mere accident in the war that they did good service. It was the merest accident it was not twenty-five millions of money thrown away. As a matter of fact I acknowledge they did good service.

Now, sir, we have the best material for an army ever offered to any Government in the world out of which to make an army. We have men who have had military experience crowding to get places in the Army. Let us now get an army that will last five years at least, and not after we have consolidated and crystallized it and made it an efficient body of men have it go out of service to get other men in again.

My amendment may be advocated on the score of economy. There is always some extra pay when men are mustered out at the expiration of their term of enlistment. It will be a great saving to give this extra pay at the end of a five years' enlistment instead of at the end of a three years' enlistment. You will adopt the amendment, then, from motives of economy, but more than all other reasons for the purpose of having a well disciplined and permanent army. I hope we will make the term of enlistment five years instead of three.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it is not the committee, but my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that proposes to change the custom; for the present term of service is three years. The gentleman proposes to carry it back to what it was at the commencement of the war in the regular Army. Now, I am not able, without reference to the military law, to tell precisely the date of the change in the law from three years' to five years' service.

Mr. GARFIELD. In 1862, I think.

Mr. SCHENCK. That was from five to three. The experience acquired by our fathers in the Revolution led them, in 1790 and 1791, and thereafter by successive enactments, to fix the term of enlistment at three years, and it was only some few years before the late rebellion that the term was prolonged to five years. What the committee proposes now is, that having changed it from five years to three in 1862, we shall keep it as it is.

There is much force in the argument used by the gentleman in reference to the experiences that men acquire in the service and the advantage of having old soldiers. He only concurs in the opinion of every officer who speaks on the subject. If it were left to the officers themselves to settle the question, they would require men to serve ten years instead of five.

But when you come to legislate upon this matter you must take into consideration the character of our people, the kind of men we propose to fill up the ranks of the Army with. The question then becomes one of politics, or of political economy, and all that relates to the industrial pursuits of our people have to be taken into consideration as well as the question of simply getting good veteran soldiers.

Now, sir, our Army is to be made up of men drawn from all the walks of life. Young farmers, journeymen mechanics, and young men who have not yet settled themselves in any particular pursuit, form the great body of the Army, and by far its best material. And I undertake to say that three years carved out of the life of a young American belonging to either of these classes is equal to about ten years taken out of the slow life of a European. I mean to say that our young men are not willing as a body to give five years of their time to the service of the country, while hundreds and thousands of the very same young men might be willing to dedicate three years to this military work.

Take a young farmer eighteen years of age. He wants to see something of the world in a new phase; he wants to look at it in a military aspect, and he is willing to enter the Army for three years, but not to spare five years of his youth for that service and come back at the age of twenty-three, twenty-four, or twenty-five to settle himself in life.

I go further than that. Though I am not given to vain-glorious praise of the people of this country, yet I believe that a young American learns more and is worth more in his three years' service than most Europeans in ten years. Our young men acquire military knowledge quicker, they have more spirit, and they perform military service better and they are more fitted even for command after three years' experience as privates than any other people on the face of the earth.

I prefer, therefore, to accommodate our legislation somewhat to the character of the people of the country, whom we expect to call upon to fill up and constitute the great body of our standing Army or of any army that we ever put into the field.

For these reasons, without dwelling upon them more at length—though much could be said, perhaps, on both sides of this question—I am not convinced of the propriety of going back to the old terms of five years, particularly when, as a part of the system, the Committee on Military Affairs, looking to legislation upon this subject with a view to a cure of an evil, have proposed a bill (No. 450) to regulate the pay and compensation of officers and soldiers of the Army. And as it may be inconvenient for gentlemen to turn to their files to look at that bill I will read one of its provisions. Section four contains this provision:

And be it further enacted, That the pay and allowances of all non-commissioned officers and enlisted men in the Army of the United States shall continue the same as provided by the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1861, and by other existing laws; but hereafter each enlisted man shall, instead of any allowance for bounty, receive an increase on his pay proper of one dollar per month for each month of faithful service in the second year of his enlistment, and a further like increase of one dollar more per month for faithful service in the third year of his enlistment; and when any soldier re-enlists immediately, or within ninety days after the expiration of a previous term of enlistment, it shall be counted as one continuous term of enlistment, and he shall receive from year to year additional pay at the rate of one dollar per month in each successive year that he remains in the service.

At the proper time the committee hope to have an opportunity of insisting upon that proposition, as a means of curing some of the evils now existing, and of elevating the character of the service, as a scheme by means of which the services of the soldiers may be secured continuously for the benefit of the Government. And though it would seem to entail a heavy additional expense upon the Government, by increasing the pay of the soldier a dollar a month for each successive year, so that he shall receive seventeen dollars a month the second year, eighteen dollars a month the third year, and nineteen dollars a month the fourth year, if he shall reënlist, and so on from year to year of service, yet it is more than compensated even upon the score of economy, as a means of getting rid of this whole difficult question of bounty hereafter, and substituting a gradual increase of pay in its stead to the faithful soldier. And I hope we shall keep the time of three years in this section.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House to Senate resolution No. 29, for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department.

Also, that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 89, to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MILITIA ORGANIZATION.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Militia, reported a bill to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia and organizing an active militia force throughout the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Militia.

AMERICAN REGISTERS OF VESSELS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 89, to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the Senate amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the amendment of the House the following: And American registers or enrollment and license to the following-named vessels; that is to say, the ship Screamer, now called Roamer, of Brunswick, Maine; the barge Mary, of Detroit; the steam-tug Sampson, of Detroit; the schooners Caledonia and Enterprise, of Detroit; and the Anglo-Saxon, a Canadian-built vessel.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out the words "now called Roamer."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in as amended; and I also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN TREATIES.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, Senate joint resolution No. 69, making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, Senate bill No. 190, to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD to amend the tenth section so as to make the term of enlistment five years instead of three years, as provided by the bill as reported.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word in reply to what the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. SCHENCK] has said in favor of three years' enlistments. He says he desires to encourage the young men of this country to go into the Army a short time, to see life, to get a taste of military life, before they enter upon what will be their permanent pursuits of life. Now, that may be very pleasant for the young men themselves; but it seems to me our true theory should be to legislate for the best interests of the Army and of the Government.

The suggestion of the gentleman, however, is but a part of the general principle which seems to be prevailing in this country, that offices and positions of any sort are a kind of gift, or rather a sort of plum-pudding, which everybody has a right to take a bite of, and when he has had his bite, some one else should be allowed to take a bite.

Now, it occurs to me that offices and positions are rather for the benefit of the Government than especially for the benefit of classes of people. And if the principle of rotation must be adopted in offices generally, it occurs to me that it had better not be adopted when we are organizing a great army for a great Government. For my part, I believe that this habit of encouraging our young men to dash into this little occupation and that little occupation, having no fixed purpose, is a bad one, and I would be glad to discourage them from it by making the term of service longer, so that the man who chooses the profession of arms shall go into the Army as a definite, permanent, chosen profession, and not merely for a short time. Let them go into it for the purpose of making themselves soldiers, with the purpose of rising by their merits from the ranks, if possible, to the highest positions in the Army.

We must consider, also, the immense extent of this country; we have to send men three or four thousand miles away, to points which it takes six months to reach and six months to come back from, thus using up a year in going and coming. Then it takes one year to fit them for duty, leaving, if you fix the term at three years, only one year for efficient service. I hope we shall not limit ourselves to that point.

I know that there are advantages to the persons enlisted in such a system, and feel myself to be, in some sort, a brevet member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I would always rather work with its chairman than against him. I do not believe, however, that he makes much point on this matter. I believe that by and by he will be better satisfied if we have a permanent army based on the five years' principle, which has prevailed far more in the Government than the three years' principle has done. We reduced the term of service to three years merely to meet the present necessities of the Government at a time when it was difficult to get men. We found it troublesome then to get enough men who were willing to go into the service for five years. But now, when we have men in abundance who are just as ready to enter the service for five years as for three, it seems to me that we ought not to omit the opportunity to get an army for the full term of five years, and make it a great, solid, permanent body of men.

I move the previous question on my amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 25, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROUSSEAU and GARFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 48.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and GLOSSBRENNER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 61, not voting, 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Boutwell, Bundy, Chanler, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Jencks, Kelley, Kelso, Marvin, McKee, McKuer, Meurer, Newell, Niblack, Samuel J. Randall, Shanklin, Smith, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Townbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Wentworth, Williams, and Woodbridge—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Dawes, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Ketchum, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, Miller, Morris, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Phelps, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, James F. Wilson, and Windom—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Bidwell, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Culum, Oliver, Darling, Dawson, Deftres, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kerr, Ladin, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Noell, Orth, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—82.

So Mr. GARFIELD's amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to employ in the Territories and Indian country a force of Indians, not to exceed one thousand, to act as scouts, who shall receive the pay and allowances of cavalry soldiers, and be discharged whenever the necessity for their further employment is abated, or at the discretion of the department commander.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one lieutenant general, five major generals, and ten brigadier generals, who shall have the same pay and emoluments, and be entitled to the same staff officers in number and grade, as now provided by law.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Adjutant-General's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the number of officers now authorized by law, namely, one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; four adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and thirteen adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grade of major, no appointment shall be made to fill such vacancy until the number of majors in the department shall be reduced to ten, to which number the said grade shall thereafter be limited.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee to explain to the House, before we pass from this thirteenth section, precisely what is meant by the creation of this new office of "adjutant" in the staff department. I would like to know whether these officers, called "adjutants" will be eligible to promotion in the regular staff department, or whether this is a new office which is created; and if so, what is its grade? It is evidently an innovation upon the present mode of organizing that staff; and I would like to hear the reason for the change.

Mr. SCHENCK. Nothing whatever was meant by the committee except to get rid of a long, lumbering title. In reorganizing the Adjutant General's department we thought it well to drop the words "assistant adjutant general," as now applied to every officer, even of the most subordinate grade in that department, and to call these officers simply what they are, adjutants. Each regiment has its adjutant, who is known as regimental adjutant; then there are other adjutants; and at the head of them all is an Adjutant General who bears a relation upon the general staff to the Army such as adjutants of regiments do to the organizations to which they belong. We thought it unnecessary, either in the quartermaster's department or in the Adjutant General's Office, to continue forever the cumbersome titles, "assistant quartermaster" or "assistant adjutant general." In reorganizing what relates to the adjutancy of the Army, that portion of the staff through which orders issue, and which thus has the general supervision or direction, under the proper commanding officers, of whatever is done, it seemed to us entirely unnecessary to perpetuate these long titles.

The gentleman inquires whether these adjutants will be entitled to promotion as in other cases. Of course they will. They are a part of the same general department, occupying their several ranks, some as majors, some as lieutenant colonels, some as colonels; but we have restricted the title "assistant adjutant general" to the two assistants of the Adjutant General, who in his absence may be called upon to occupy temporarily his position. The provision of the bill, therefore, is for "one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry." Then the bill goes on to provide for "four adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and thirteen adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry." If this mode of simplifying the matter should not, in the opinion of members of the House, conform to good taste or propriety, they will of course correct our correction.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by striking out the thirteenth section, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Adjutant General's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely: one adjutant general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; four assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and thirteen assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry.

Mr. Speaker, what I propose as a substitute for this section is the corresponding section of the Senate bill. It leaves the present organization of the Adjutant General's department unchanged. Now, sir, I wish to say, in regard to what has fallen from the chairman of the committee, that I am surprised that he should take the view that the effect of the section as it stands in this bill is simply to change the title of an office. The effect of the alteration made by the bill before the House is really to legislate out of the Army of the United States no less than thirteen of its regular officers, and to deprive them of their commissions.

Mr. HALE. Seventeen.

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; seventeen.

There is something more than a mere matter of verbal taste in a proposal of that kind; something more than a mere preference for a particular word.

Now, sir, as this is a point of the gentleman's bill where is commenced a process which, if carried out, would undermine and disorganize the whole system of the Army of the United States as it is at present organized, I desire to call the attention of the House to the changes which are initiated in the thirteenth section, now pending. The same operation which is performed by this section on the Adjutant General's department is by subsequent sections performed on the quartermaster's department and on the subsistence department.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. And in the pay department.

Mr. THAYER. And also in the pay department. The officers holding commissions, or at any rate a great part of them, in these departments of the Army are, by a few strokes of the gentleman's pen, driven out of the Army of the United States and deprived of their commissions; and he tells us in justification of a measure so sweeping as that, so indefensible and so full of injustice, that it is a mere question of words whether a man is to be called an adjutant or assistant adjutant general. Does not every man know an officer who is assistant adjutant general in the United States Army holds his commission in that capacity and holds no other commission? The rank he holds is simply incident to the office he holds, and when you abolish the office he holds you deprive him of his employment and his commission.

Is there any man in the House who has read this bill who will undertake to deny that this is the legal effect of the section under consideration? I apprehend not.

The same thing, as I have already said, will be accomplished by subsequent sections in reference to the other staff corps of the Army, if this bill shall become a law in its present shape. All these gentlemen, some of whom have been in the Army of the United States, for many years—one of them, as I know, over forty years—officers who have spent their lives in the service of the country, and who have greatly aided in conducting it triumphantly through the late great war, are to be condemned unheard and driven from the Army. They are not to have accorded to them even the poor privilege of being tried by the star-chamber proceeding provided for in the thirty-third section of the bill.

By the thirty-third section the committee invite us to provide a grand council to indict the two thousand or more officers of the Army of the United States. This grand inquisition is to present them for trial before a petit jury of three officers, who, I say without hesitation, are armed by the terms of the bill with the power of conviction, but with no power of acquittal.

You do not even offer to the poor assistant adjutant generals—the seventeen you propose to immolate by this section—the chance to be presented by this grand council and tried by your petit jury of three. You turn them out of the Army without trial, without examination, nay, without accusation.

I thought, sir, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] a few moments ago, speaking of this bill, said that the idea was to make a brilliant army, he was indulging in a display of that parliamentary irony which the gentleman from Ohio condemned yesterday in the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] Sir, it may be a brilliant army after you have perpetrated this great injustice and swept out all the officers on the various staffs who have been doing service there, some of them during the greater part of their lives, and faithful and eminent service, too, without so much as a trial or accusation. It may be a brilliant army, in your estimation, after you have incorporated into your law the twenty-ninth section, which gives the President of the United States power to transfer an officer at his volition from the staff to the line, from one staff corps to another staff corps, from one arm of the regular service to another arm of the service, to swap them about as politicians may request for the benefit of their favorites and followers. It may be a brilliant army, in your estimation, if you adopt the twenty-eighth section and destroy the great and just principle of promotion by seniority in service (a principle which I maintain to be the only just and proper one regulating promotions under our system of government) and substitute for it a political scramble for promotion. I say, when you do all this injustice and make all these disorganizing changes you may have perhaps what may be ironically termed a brilliant army, but it will not be an army, sir, in the military sense of that word. It will not be an army which could oppose a respectable mob. It will be, sir, itself but a mob.

Now, the section which I propose to substitute is the corresponding provision of the Senate bill; and I propose to follow it, if it shall be adopted by the House, by proposing similar substitutes in the case of all those provisions which in my judgment affect injuriously the staff corps of the Army. The substitute which I offer does not disturb the present organization of the Army. It leaves it, as regards this staff corps, untouched. As it is now it does no injustice; it deprives no officer of his commission without a hearing; it turns out no faithful officer from the service; it violates no principle, and is no injurious innovation. It is simply the preservation of what already exists, and what, in my judgment, is infinitely better than the experiment which is proposed.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say a single word in regard to the pending section. The chairman of the committee is very well aware—and it is not improper for me to say it—that as a member of the committee I have differed from him in regard to this bill as regards the staff corps. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] I think, would not have shown so much indignation against the committee if he had understood the origin of this nomenclature, as applied to the staff corps. I will state how this change of nomenclature originated.

The Quartermaster General of the Army, an officer for whom I have a most profound respect, was at my instance invited before the Military Committee to discuss the affairs relating to his department, and this is the department to which the gentleman has referred with the most zeal.

Mr. THAYER. No, sir; my amendment does not relate to that department. You have made this change in the Adjutant General's department.

Mr. BLAINE. Do not interrupt me at this moment. The Quartermaster General himself suggested that the titles in the staff corps, particularly relating to his own, were unduly long and cumbersome, and he asked that they should be changed and made verbatim, literatim, et punctualim as they are in this bill. And it was as a convenience to him that it was done. And now that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should suppose that it was the design of the Military Committee to legislate a set of gentlemen out of office by a change of nomenclature, I can hardly think he is serious about it.

I agree with him that that change would have that effect. I am not in favor of the change; but I want to say that it was the furthest from the intention of the committee to do anything more than to accede to the wishes of the departments, as they thought were expressed through this chief.

Now, one word about the Adjutant General's department. If I cannot have a better amendment than the one the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] has offered, I shall vote for that. I think the argument of the chairman of the committee in regard to curtailing the size of this staff corps is unsound. The section provides that after a certain time the assistant adjutants of the corps shall be reduced to ten.

Here let me state a fact. When the war broke out in 1861, with a little army of eleven thousand men, capable of being enlarged to nineteen thousand, there were fourteen officers in the Adjutant General's department, and it was not considered too many. During the war it was increased by six. And now, with an army four or five times as great, there are only six added, making twenty. You have not increased them fifty per cent. while you increase the Army fourfold. I think, instead of decreasing the number, it ought to be increased.

When the generals in convention—Generals Grant, Meade, and Sherman—recommended that there should be seventeen of these officers the committee in the Senate agreed to it, but the committee of the House did not concur, but introduced a provision cutting it down to ten, which it seems to me is entirely inadequate.

One word further. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] if he will accept an amendment by me as a substitute for his. The number of officers of high rank in all the departments, Quartermaster General's, Ordnance, Subsistence, and everywhere else, has been very much more increased than in the Adjutant General's department. In almost every instance an adjutant general, either brigadier or major general, is the chief of staff. An adjutant general on a staff, where there is no chief of staff by that name, has as much employment as a chief of staff. And if there should be a difference in rank it certainly should be in favor of rather than against the adjutant generals. I think, therefore, that without increasing the number of officers in this department there should be a change in their grades and rank, and I propose, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] will accept the amendment, that the section shall be made to read as follows:

That the Adjutant General's department shall hereafter consist of the same number of officers now authorized by law, and their rank shall be as follows, namely, one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; four assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; five assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels; and ten assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors.

All that that does is to change the rank of three majors to that of two colonels and one lieutenant colonel, and that will give an opportunity for such meritorious officers as Major Vincent and others, who have done very valuable duty during the war, to have some chance of promotion. It does not increase the number of officers; it only changes the grade of three of the officers in the department. I hope the gentleman will accept this as a substitute for what he has himself offered.

Mr. THAYER. I will accept the amendment if the gentleman will strike out the words "number of;" so that it will read:

That the Adjutant General's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, &c.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; I will do that. I mean no trick about this matter.

Mr. THAYER. I did not suspect the gentleman of that, and I now accept his amendment, as modified, in lieu of my own.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, we are told by members of the Committee on Military Affairs that this change in the name and rank of the officers in the Adjutant General's department came to them on the recommendation of the Quartermaster General. Now, if it came from the Quartermaster General, as I have no doubt it did, from the gentleman's statement, he has certainly been guilty of great weakness, or else, certainly, of doing great injustice to his corps. And if the provisions of this bill are adhered to, when the time comes, I shall move that the rank of quartermaster general, which General Meigs has very well for his own purposes kept in the bill, shall be reduced to that of chief quartermaster. If we are to have nothing but quartermasters, then the man at the head of the department should be chief quartermaster. But I am sure the House do not want to do injustice, and that when they see what the operation of this bill will be, in law, they will not sustain it.

Here we have seventeen officers in the Adjutant General's department who have passed the best part of their lives there, and nobody has ever found fault with the way in which they have discharged the duties of their important offices. They have been there during the better portion of their lives. There is no accusation against them; no charge. They were commissioned as what? As assistant adjutant generals; and if this bill passes those men will, in spite of their services in that department and in the Army, under their commissions as adjutant generals, by the law drop out of the service. The office will be abolished; there will be no such rank in the Adjutant General's department, and hence they will be dropped from the rolls of the Army without any charges being made against them; and when everybody knows that they have performed their duties well and faithfully.

Now, I am quite sure, that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] cannot entertain the same view of the operation of this section which I do; for he is a just man; and I am sure he does not desire to do injustice to these men who are valuable to the Government in the positions which they occupy.

Now, I do say—and I beg the members of the House to listen to me a moment—that if this bill passes in its present shape these seventeen men will, by virtue of its provisions, as a matter of law, be absolutely and forever, unless they should be reappointed, dropped from the rolls of the Army. Who asks that that shall be done? Who would favor such a great injustice? Why, sir, even a reappointment would not reinstate them, because their commissions would be dated at the time of their reappointment, and that would make a great difference in their pay, their positions, their rank, and in every way.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] which has been accepted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] will prevail, because I think it is just.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is not to be wondered at that a bill relating to the organization of the Army, and therefore looking to war, should stir up this House as this bill seems to do. Gentlemen seem incapable of speaking upon almost any question connected with the bill without showing a belligerent state of feeling, at least toward the committee which has had the honor, in the discharge of their duties to this House, of reporting this bill. The bill was framed according to the best of their ability; a great deal of care and pains was bestowed upon every part of it, however unfortunate they may have been in satisfying the expectations of gentlemen all around the House.

Now, all I have further to say on that general point of the course taken by the committee, shall be this; and I say it now once for all: when gentlemen on either side of the House shall see proper to intimate or say that the Committee on Military Affairs has been cunning, has had sinister purposes, has designed indirectly to make war upon somebody, I do not think their impeachment is worthy of being answered. It is unworthy in them to make any such imputation, and it is unworthy in us to reply to it. When gentlemen suspect cunning and sinister motives in others, I am myself naturally inclined, although not generally suspicious, to suspect that it must be because they derive their conclusions from some consciousness within themselves that they would have been so influenced had they had the same duty to perform.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman from Ohio, in his last remark, refer to anything that I have said?

Mr. SCHENCK. So far as the gentleman said we meant any covert attack upon these officers, I do refer to him.

Mr. THAYER. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. SCHENCK. I so understood the gentleman. If the tenor of his remarks was not to that effect, then what I have said has no application to him.

Mr. THAYER. I certainly intended to make no reflection upon the committee in anything that I said. I simply argued that the result of the section which they report in their bill was to commit an act of the most gross injustice. But I trust that no one supposed for a moment that I intended to charge the Committee on Military Affairs with a deliberate design to do injustice. Of course every one understands that they fell into this error inadvertently. I intended to cast no imputation upon that committee, and suppose that no one understood me as intending any.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman had no such intention, then my remarks are not in the slightest degree applicable to him. I misunderstood him, perhaps, in supposing that he did impute to the committee a design thus indirectly to get men out of office.

But we have been charged more than once in the course of the debate on former days, if not to-day, with being exceedingly cunning and sinister in our designs. If we have not been so charged, then my remarks fall to the ground. If we have been so charged, then that is the only reply I have to make.

Now, in reference to this particular matter, I am not certain but what in point of law the gentleman is right, and that this provision as it now stands would vacate some of these commissions. And when my attention was called to it, after we had adopted this different nomenclature for these officers, under the circumstances stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] I myself prepared an amendment to obviate any such difficulty, and to prevent any such conclusions against these officers. My amendment was written specially with reference to the Adjutant General's department, as I promised it should be, because my conversation was with one connected with that department, who spoke of this as the probable effect of this provision. And I intended, should the House agree with the committee in simplifying these titles (otherwise it would be unnecessary) to move a similar amendment in reference to any other department in which the titles have been changed. I will read the amendment which I have prepared to come in at the end of this section as a proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to vacate the commission of any officer now commissioned as assistant adjutant general, but only to change the title to adjutant, leaving the same officer in the same position he held when bearing the former title.

Now, I repeat, this change of title is a matter of taste and propriety, more than anything else; and therefore, if the House should disagree with the committee, I shall not feel disposed to complain. My colleague on the committee has stated how this change originated—that the Quartermaster General himself, in the course of a discussion of all the various matters pertaining to his department, adverted to the lumbering titles which attach to the officers of that department as well as other bureaus or staff departments. Any gentleman who considers for a moment what those titles are can satisfy himself whether the complaint of the Quartermaster General is well founded.

We have a large number of officers—these seventeen who have been spoken of—who are called assistant adjutant generals. They are connected with the Adjutant General's department. We thought it would simplify the matter to provide that, in this great department, where the adjutancy of the Army is concentrated, the subordinate officers should be called "adjutants" simply, while we provide for two assistants of the Adjutant General, who retain the title of assistant adjutant general.

So also, in the quartermaster's department, we thought that, instead of having a large number of officers signing themselves "Deputy Quartermaster General" and Assistant Quartermaster General, it would simplify the matter to have a Quartermaster General, with two or three assistant quartermaster generals, to take his place in his absence or upon an emergency, and to call the rest simply "quartermasters," some to rank as lieutenant colonels, some as majors, and some as captains.

The system of having these numerous officers with these cumbersome titles sometimes leads to confusion. I recollect an instance that occurred a good many years ago when the title of "Deputy Quartermaster General" had perhaps been recently adopted in the Army. A rather fancy gentleman who held that position, but whose occupation before he went into the Army had been very different, was fond of attaching to his name upon every hotel register the letters "D. Q. M. G.," after which, on one occasion, a mischievous fellow following him wrote as the explanation or translation, "Damned quick-made general!" [Laughter.]

Now, if I can avoid it, I want no more of these "D. Q. M. G.'s," "A. Q. M. G.'s," "A. Q. M.'s," and "A. A. G.'s." Now when we have an opportunity, upon a general reorganization of the Army, I think it would be better, without legislating anybody out or anybody in, (for this bill is made with reference to the Army establishment, and not to persons, however gentlemen may mistake it in that respect,) to simplify names as well as other things, so far as we can, taking care that in doing so no injustice shall be done. If this idea should prevail, gentlemen will find me ready to meet them more than half way in the effort to provide against any such consequences as they apprehend.

Now, sir, one word more before I close. I am not surprised at the warmth which is manifested whenever a finger is laid upon one of these bureaus or staff departments. It is a difficulty which we have encountered whenever there has been any attempt at legislation upon the subject of the Army, and which is every day increasing, that while our legislation is generally satisfactory to the line officers, the men in the field, the men at the front, the men who do the hard work out-of-doors, we are surrounded by gentlemen just as good, just as industrious, just as laborious, who, however, being situated here at the center, are ready to watch our proceedings, and unless we take care to refrain from doing anything which shall interfere in any way with their prerogatives or their convenience or their comfort, we have the whole of them using their influence against us.

And these gentlemen exercise very deservedly a great deal of influence. There are stationed in and about this city in the various Departments and bureaus, some hundreds of officers, each one of whom has his official, his personal, his social, his moral influence, which we all feel. I know a vast number of them, having, perhaps, as large a circle of acquaintance (and very pleasant acquaintance) among them as almost anybody else. But I declare here now that this sort of social and official and personal influence shall not, if I can help it, influence me in reference to the legislation which I may deem best for the general interests of the whole country.

In regard to these bureaus, let me say, former legislation has tended to attract men to Washington. I prefer the tendency of this bill and such other measures of reform as the Committee on Military Affairs desire to propose, which will have rather a centrifugal than a centripetal influence upon these gentlemen. I admit they must many of them be here, and are highly useful in being here, but at the same time I say a great many of them under this influence, or by our legislation which has stolen upon us, degree by degree, are here occupying places in these bureaus, not exactly the place for soldiers. There are men here in this city in these various bureaus who have been content to sit at their desk while the war was going on, engaged in copying records, indorsing papers, and other kindred occupations which might as well have been done, and as well done, perhaps, by intelligent clerks. I do not wish to continue that system of influence if I can help it. I wish to reduce the number of persons employed as officers as low as possible. I wish men educated at West Point, and well educated in all that relates to military knowledge, shall not, because they have been educated at our expense and after a term of four years' service there, good engineers, good gunners, full of the knowledge of military tactics, be employed simply as clerks.

There will be other features in this bill to which this same objection will be made, and I have thought it proper to say this much in advance. It will be found when we come to the subsistence department and the pay department we have made a like provision in regard to them. We do not believe that men educated for four years at West Point, at the Government expense, should be selected for the purpose of inspecting crackers and buying beef. This is the general effect of the kind of legislation this committee propose, and it is for the House to say whether they will sustain us in that line of legislation or not. I do not believe the Adjutant General's department should be increased.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back Senate bill No. 125, granting aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in the State of California, and moved that it be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

A bill to authorize a special tax for the purpose of improving the Washington city canal; and

A bill to incorporate the Washington Canal Company in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bills were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. HOLMES, by unanimous consent, moved that House bill No. 455, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Great Salt Lake City to the Colorado river, and to secure to the Government of the United States the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING DUTIES.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, Senate bill No. 255, to remit and refund certain duties was taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED.

On motion of Mr. WARD, leave of absence was granted for one week to Mr. ECKLEY.

WASHINGTON SEWER AND CANAL COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. WARD, Senate bill No. 190, to incorporate the Washington Sewer and Canal Company, was taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. DELANO. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with any additional reports or information he may have received relative to the condition of the southern people and the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

PAY OF POST CHAPLAINS.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to the pay of post chaplains in the United States Army; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. MILLER also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to the equalization of bounties; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. CONKLING, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Messrs. Osborn, Niles, Tegarden, Seymour, Hannah, Frederickson, and many others, business men of Laporte, Indiana, asking legislation in regard to inter-State insurance regulations.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 20, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of so much of the Winnebago and Superior railroad as extends from Doty's Island to Stevens Point; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of George F. Sherman, and eighteen others, weavers of the customs in the port and district of New York, soliciting an increase of compensation from $1,485, the sum they now receive, to $2,500 per annum, setting forth the reasons which, in their opinion, sustain the fairness and justice of their request. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the petition of Andrew Branstetter, praying that a pension be granted him; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I present the memorial of miners and smelters of copper ores in two or three of the States. They state that they invested large amounts of money in the erection and conducting of their copper mines and works at a time when copper ores were free of duty, and they ask, therefore, that they should be relieved from the duty on copper ores, and for a protective duty on ingot, pig, cake, bar, or other copper of five cents per pound. They state the reasons for it as succinctly as I could state them. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of so much of the Winnebago and Superior railroad as extends from Doty's Island to Stevens Point; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Margaret Kaetzel, praying for an appropriation for the support of herself and family, alleging that, by reason of the death of her husband, who was killed on the 5th day of April, 1865, by the premature discharge of a cannon which was being used in firing a salute by order of the Secretary of War in honor of the capture of Richmond, she has been deprived of her support, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 268) to prevent and punish the manufacture and use of false, forged, or counterfeited brands, stamps, dies, or stencils, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) to provide for the erection of a new building at the Schuylkill arsenal, near Philadelphia, to report it without amendment. There are some letters and estimates with the bill which I should like to have printed. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am also directed by the committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers. This is a House joint resolution, and was recommended to the committee the other day for the purpose of having a report of the facts in the case. The committee find that a report was made in the House of Representatives. I should like to have the resolution put on its passage now. I think it is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution on the day it is reported.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that it may be read at large, so that we may see what it provides for, before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall be allowed to get through with the reports of committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution lies over under the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Cook, praying for compensation for the use by the Government of a lot of land owned by him in the city of Washington, being lot No. 42, in square No. 184, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John H. Crowell, captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to allow him a credit of $250 in the settlement of his accounts, reported a bill (S. No. 278) for the relief of Captain John H. Crowell, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of loyal citizens of Loudon county, Virginia, praying for compensation for property destroyed by fire, and for live stock taken for the use of the Army or sold for the benefit of the United States by order of General Sheridan, reported a bill (S. No. 279) for the relief of loyal citizens of Loudon county, Virginia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 225) to aid in the construction of a southern branch of the Union Pacific railway and telegraph, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back, and to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of it, on the ground that the committee are of opinion that no further pecuniary obligations ought to be assumed by the Government to aid in the construction of branches of the Union Pacific railroad.

The report was agreed to.

WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) to extend the time for the construction of the first section of the Western Pacific railroad, have had it under consideration, and have directed me to report it back to the Senate with amendments; and they ask that it may receive the present consideration of the Senate. It is a very short joint resolution, and I hope the Senate will consent to act upon it at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to extend the time for the construction of the first twenty miles of the Western Pacific railroad to the 1st day of November, 1867.

The first amendment of the committee was to strike out "November" and insert "January."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the resolution the following:

But this extension is upon the condition to be accepted by said company, and notice of such acceptance to be given by them to the Secretary of the Interior, that the lands known as the lands of the ex-mission of San José, as included in the map and survey thereof made October, 1864, by E. H. Dyer, deputy United States surveyor, shall not be included in the grant heretofore made to the said Western Pacific Railroad Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 134) to regulate the terms of the United States courts in the eastern district of New York, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 278) in amendment of the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan and Despatch, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield S. Hancock; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

RESCUE OF THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 31. It will take but a few moments and it is rather important that it should be acted on promptly.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) manifesting the sense of Congress toward the officers and seamen of the vessels, and others, engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a request to the President of the United States to procure three valuable gold medals, with suitable devices, one to be presented to Captain Creighton, of the ship Three Bells, of Glasgow; one to Captain Low, of the bark Kilby, of Boston; and one to Captain Stouffer, of the ship Antarctic, as testimonials of national gratitude for their gallant conduct in rescuing about five hundred Americans from the wreck of the steamship San Francisco.

Mr. JOHNSON. I propose to amend the resolution by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That a sum not exceeding $50,000 be hereby appropriated, out of any money in Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to reward, in such manner as he may deem most appropriate, the officers and crews of those vessels that aided in the rescue of the survivors of said wreck, and such other persons as distinguished themselves by offices of humanity and heroism on that occasion, the reward to be proportionate to the nature of the efforts made and the merit of the services rendered so far as the same can be ascertained.

The resolution proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs is one of two resolutions heretofore before the Senate and adopted by a very decided vote. The Military Committee, however, on this occasion, did not report the second of the original resolutions. The original resolutions gave first a gold medal for the services stated, and secondly, as reported by the committee of the Senate, $100,000; but the appropriation of $100,000 was amended in the Senate by being reduced to $50,000. The circumstances which, in the judgment of the Senate at that time, rendered it due to the reputation of the United States and to the aid which the parties whose names are mentioned had contributed to save the lives of the soldiers of the United States, may, perhaps, have escaped the recollection of the Senate. I will, therefore, very briefly call to the attention of the Senate now the facts as they were known to the Senate at that time and as they certainly existed.

The San Francisco, a steamer of the United States, left the port of New York in the month of December 1853, with several hundred soldiers on board. It was apprehended at that time that there might be difficulty on the north-western border; and the Government thought it advisable to have troops there. The officers carried with them their families, and the number of officers and soldiers and the families of the officers and the families of some of the soldiers constituted an aggregate of about nine hundred souls on board. The San Francisco had been out a few days when she encountered a terrific storm, and during six days of that storm before any aid was received by her there were about one hundred and seventy washed overboard. The storm continued with terrific violence during the whole of that period. While they were in that condition and expected all of them to be lost, almost every moment of time, one or two vessels hove in sight, but they refused to assist, pleading their inability to assist, believing that an attempt to render aid would be fatal to themselves, when finally the steamer Three Bells, an English steamer commanded by Captain Creighton, hove in sight. The American steamer, the San Francisco, was commanded by Captain Watkins, known familiarly upon the Pacific, as the Senators from California will bear me out in saying, as Commodore Watkins, a Maryland man by birth, but one who has been following the sea all his life, and for the last fifteen or twenty years has been a citizen and resident of California. He commanded her, and notwithstanding his great skill and unflinching courage and his attempt to keep up the spirits of those who were on board, it was very evident that destruction was inevitable unless assistance was soon received.

In this condition of things the Three Bells hove in sight. Distress guns were fired. As soon as the captain saw that the steamer was in peril he went to her aid. His own vessel was leaking then to the extent of making about nine inches of water an hour. He was short of provisions. The moment he came within a distance to be communicated with directly, Captain Watkins—the wind being so high that it was impossible to make himself heard, either by his own voice or with the aid of the trumpet—placed upon a board in large letters what the captain of the Three Bells understood to be, “We are in distress; save us; we will charter your vessel.” This British captain, true to the instincts of humanity, and true, too, to the general instincts which characterize the sailor, said at once, with some surprise and some indignation, “What does the man want? Does he suppose that I am here for the purpose of chartering my vessel to make money? I am here to save all who are on board, if I can, and I will lay by your vessel as long as my own will swim.” The storm continued with unabated violence, and he remained within sight, sailing round and round, (his sails having been all destroyed except one or two of the lighter sails,) in the hopes of taking up any who might be washed overboard in the interim, before he could take from the impending wreck any one of the passengers or crew. During the whole of that time it was very doubtful which would go down first, his own vessel or the San Francisco; but he succeeded in keeping his own afloat.

He then launched two of his small boats, and with those two boats he got off about two or three hundred, I think, from the San Francisco. Captain Watkins then informed him that there were a great many sick, and there were women and children on board whom he was unwilling to trust in a small boat. Captain Creighton had been afraid up to that time to launch his larger boat, but he determined at all hazards to make the effort. She was launched, the sea running mountain high, all expecting to go down on both vessels, when fortunately for himself, and for the United States, and for all who were on board, he succeeded in getting on board the San Francisco every soul, sick and well, man, woman, and child. Captain Watkins was the last to leave his vessel; and they had barely got to the Three Bells and another vessel that had hove in sight in the mean time, and who aided in getting off a part of the crew, before the San Francisco went down. One of the vessels, after the Three Bells had saved some one hundred and seventy or two hundred, came to their aid and with great humanity and daring skill took some one hundred of the passengers. They were on their way to Europe, and they carried them to Europe.

The Three Bells sailed for New York. She was a great many days in getting to New York. She was kept afloat by the untiring exertions of the crew, for she was making water at the rate of nine inches an hour. She was short of provisions, and she was obliged to put all on board upon short allowance; and in order to take care of those who were received on board she was compelled to throw overboard the whole of her cargo that was under deck, it being impossible to accommodate the rescued above deck, it being absolutely necessary to give them the protection which they would have by being under deck. He immediately made for New York. He was six days in reaching that port. When he did reach it, he had but a very small quantity of water; it would not have lasted another day; and he had been compelled to place the passengers and crew upon an allowance, each, of two ounces of water, half a biscuit, and one ounce of bacon, during the whole of the six days that he was making the port of New York. On his arrival at New York, he had but fifty gallons of water; and he landed in New York three hundred passengers, men, women, and children.

Perhaps Senators do not bear in mind the scene which took place upon the arrival of the vessel at New York, and the solicitude that was felt for the fate of the vessel before the arrival of the passengers. He was fêted in New York the moment of his arrival. The Government paid for the loss of the cargo; but so signal was the service of rescuing from inevitable death some six or seven hundred soldiers of the United States, having with them many of the wives and children belonging to the men and the officers, that the Senate of the United States, upon the 6th of February, 1854, passed a resolution identical with the one now reported to the Senate by the Committee on Military Affairs, and another resolution, after reducing the amount originally named in it, identical with the resolution that I now offer to the report of the committee. As the Senate committee at that time reported the second resolution, they gave $100,000. Pending the consideration of the subject in the Senate it was reduced to $50,000; and I propose now that the Senate should adopt what the Senate adopted then, by a vote, I think, of 27 yeas to 16 nays.

The Senate, perhaps, may have forgotten, even those who heard at the time of this valuable service, the great enthusiasm which was manifested throughout all the commercial cities upon the arrival of the British vessel with a portion of the passengers of the lost vessel in New York. The others that were taken on board by one of the other vessels that came to the rescue were safely carried to Liverpool, and found their way back to this country. Captain Creighton, of the Three Bells, was fêted in New York. Every demonstration of gratitude was shown him. The Senate of the United States, by a very large majority, deeming it due to him, and to the others who had contributed in saving some seven or eight hundred officers and men of the Army of the United States and their families, passed a resolution such as is now reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, with the other resolution which I now propose by way of amendment.

I suppose many Senators may now have freshly before them, when the subject is called to their recollection, the enthusiastic joy with which the arrival of the Three Bells was received at the port of New York, and the tidings that some three or four hundred of the rescued of the ill-fated ship were on their way, perhaps in safety, to Europe. Captain Creighton was fêted all through New York by nearly all the societies engaged commercially. Every possible honor was evinced toward him. The heart of the nation gushed with gratitude for such services, and the passage in this body—it failing in the other House only for want of time—of a resolution such as is now reported by the Military Committee, with the addition which I propose now as an amendment, was hailed with grateful joy, as I well remember, by the people of the United States. It was a tribute due, not only for the humanity evinced by the parties who were engaged in the rescue, but for the daring gallantry they displayed, and the imminent risks they ran of losing their own lives in an effort to save the lives of citizens of the United States.

The whole nation's heart gushed with gratitude for such distinguished services, and the passage of a resolution distributing $50,000, as well as a gold medal, was hailed, as I remember, with unmingled joy throughout every portion of the United States.

At that time, Mr. President, it was a matter comparatively unimportant to the captains of these three vessels, and particularly the captain of the British vessel, whether the gratitude of the nation should be evinced in a pecuniary way or not; but he was engaged in the American trade; he has always been an enthusiastic admirer of the American character, and has felt, as I know, an earnest solicitude for the success of the United States in the rebellion through which she has so happily and gloriously passed; and in consequence of that very rebellion he has been reduced almost to poverty. He is now here, and has been here for many months, and he seeks at the hands of Congress some valuable manifestation of their recognition of the services rendered without the slightest view at that time to any recognition of them of a pecuniary character; but now, when the recent unfortunate condition of the country has placed him in a situation of comparative want, he is willing to receive, anxious to receive, and as I think the honor and character of the United States require that he should receive, some substantial manifestation of the gratitude which the United States owe to him as a gallant sailor, looking to no other reward at the time than that which flows from a noble action performed in the cause of humanity. He is now anxious to receive the comparative pittance which the amendment I have proposed will give him, when divided between the three who were engaged in the humane effort.

As I have said, about one hundred and seventy were washed overboard before he could come to the rescue; but he, and the others who came afterward to his aid, saved some five or six hundred lives of officers and soldiers of the United States and several of the families of the officers and the soldiers; and I remember as if it were but yesterday, although I was not in the councils of the nation at that time, with what joy the passage by the Senate of the resolution, such as it will be if you adopt the amendment I have proposed, was hailed throughout the United States. It was hailed as a manifestation of national gratitude for distinguished services, rendered at the imminent peril of life, not only of himself but of his crew, and at the certain destruction of the cargo which was intrusted to his charge; and the answer that the man gave when, misunderstanding the telegraph that Captain Watkins sent him by means of the board which he held up, (a telegraph, as he supposed, indicating the opinion of Watkins that he would not lay by his vessel except on the promise of some reward,) evinced the character of the true sailor. "What does the man mean?" was his indignant reply. Substantially he said, "Here I will remain; and if it be possible I will save all on board the evidently sinking vessel or lose my own life in the effort;" and he succeeded.

The book that I hold in my hand, which the honest and bold and humane sailor has kept by him from that time to this, is filled with manifestations of the nation's gratitude; and he was able to save from the elements the letter that was thrown overboard by Captain Watkins, which I will trouble the Senate by reading. It was picked up at sea:

STEAMSHIP SAN FRANCISCO,
January 1, 1854.

DEAR CAPTAIN: We are in great distress. Do not leave us. We have already lost about one hundred and eighty of our number, washed overboard. We have United States troops on board, and the commanding officer will charter your ship. We have plenty of water and provisions on board. We now number about four hundred and twenty, all told. I find it too rough to do anything with our rafts; they are made and waiting a calm.

Yours, &c.,
JAMES T. WATKINS,
Captain.

That was on the 1st of January, 1854; and this noble and humane—as all noble men are—sailor remained, at the imminent peril of his life and the lives of all those who were on board of his own ship and of the loss of his ship, alongside during the terrific storm that lasted for six days, during the whole of the six days, and he succeeded in rescuing every living soul left on board on the 1st of January; and I remember (and I recollect the proud feeling with which I received the information) the delight with which the vote given by the Senate on the occasion thrilled the public heart of the nation. Six or seven hundred soldiers of the United States destined to the furthest Territory of the United States to maintain the honor of its flag were rescued not only from imminent but certain death by the gallantry of this English captain and his noble officers and crew, and the disappointment, if disappointment was felt at all at the passage of the resolution through the Senate, was that the amount given was not the amount recommended by the committee. The committee recommended $100,000; and it was amended in the Senate by being reduced one half; and it only failed of receiving the sanction of the other House for want of time. After that, not wanting the money, this Englishman, or rather Scotchman, I believe, by birth, went upon his own way rejoicing in that which gave him more satisfaction than money could at that time have given him, that he had contributed so much to save so many fellow-beings, and especially to save the soldiers and sailors of the United States and their families, and everywhere where the tidings reached of what the Senate of the United States had done in manifestation of their gratitude for the distinguished service he had rendered the United States by saving the lives of her soldiery, it was hailed with delightful gratitude everywhere. Money then was to him of little or no account; but he has suffered now because of our trouble. His trade was with us; the rebellion through which we have so happily and gloriously passed in a great measure broke it up; he is now poor; and although at the time the service was rendered he had not the remotest idea of ever appealing to the gratitude of the United States for compensation for an act which he did from an impulse of pure humanity and at the risk of his life, he asks at the hands of the United States some small compensation for that peril now when the troubles in which we have been engaged and during which no one I have reason to believe more solicitously watched over us than he did—for he was always a true friend of the United States—have placed him in a condition of almost entire poverty.

Now, I propose in behalf of him and of others who were engaged in the same noble and humane undertaking that we manifest our gratitude to a heroism unsurpassed; the sea was running mountain high, threatening to engulf him and his crew, his ship leaking and making water at the rate of nine inches an hour, and he unable to keep her afloat except by the untiring exertions of himself and his crew. I ask in his behalf, and as a debt due to humanity; I ask in behalf of the officers and soldiers who were saved through his gallantry and the gallantry of two others who came to the rescue, that we shall, when we are able and he is poor, manifest our gratitude by contributing what will render, perhaps, the remainder of his days comparatively happy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LAKE PORTAGE SHIP-CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 238, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. With the leave of the Senator from New Hampshire I should like to reconsider a bill that passed during the morning hour the other day, merely to make a correction. The bill was amended before in the Senate, but as it now stands there needs to be a slight correction in order that the various parts of the bill may be in harmony with each other. There will be no question about it. It will only take two or three minutes' time.

Mr. CLARK. I will not object to that. The special order may be laid aside informally in order to allow the correction of a mistake in that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, no objection being made.

Mr. POMEROY. I have moved a reconsideration of the vote passing Senate bill No. 193, granting lands to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, in said State. I now ask that the question be taken on that reconsideration.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I now move to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. In the seventeenth line of the bill I move to strike out the words "hereby amended" and insert "herein referred to." We do not amend the former bill, but we recite it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I send to the Chair a substitute for the last proviso in reference to mineral lands.

The amendment was read, being to strike out the words—

And provided further, That no mineral lands shall be included within this grant.

And in lieu thereof to insert—

And provided further, That no lands designated by the United States as mineral before the passage of this act shall be included within this grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 134) to regulate the terms of the United States courts in the eastern district of New York, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 278) in amendment of the several acts relating to the organization of the Pension Office—to the Committee on Pensions.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed on the 17th instant, the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 31) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion;

An act (S. No. 229) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) protesting against pardons by foreign Governments of persons convicted of infamous offenses on condition of emigration to the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) for the temporary relief of destitute people in the District of Columbia.

And that on the 18th instant he approved and signed—

An act (S. No. 201) for the relief of Ann Heth, widow of William Heth, of Harrison county, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 241) directing the enrollment of Agnes W. Laughlin, the widow of a deceased soldier, as a pensioner;

An act (S. No. 248) for the relief of James G. Clarke;

An act (S. No. 252) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. Wilson; and

An act (S. No. 260) granting a pension to Mrs. Emerance Gouler.

PROTECTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to insert at the end of the first section the following words:

Or so far as it operates as a defense for any act done or omitted in any State represented in Congress during the rebellion, and in which, at the time and place of any such act or omission, martial law was not in force.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Doolittle, Edmunds, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Riddle, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. I think a slight amendment is needed in the fourth line of the third section, to strike out the words "as well."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to strike out the fourth section of the bill. That section provides:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the State court shall, notwithstanding the performance of all things required for the removal of the case to the circuit court aforesaid, proceed further in said cause or prosecution before said certificate is produced, then, in that case, all such further proceedings shall be void and of no effect; and all parties, judges, officers, and other persons, thenceforth proceeding thereunder, or by color thereof, shall be liable in damages therefor to the party aggrieved, to be recovered by action in a court of the State having proper jurisdiction, or in a circuit court of the United States for the district in which such further proceedings may have been had, or where the party, officer, or other person so offending shall be found; and upon a recovery of damages in either court, the party plaintiff shall be entitled to double costs.

Now, Mr. President, I am very free to say that if I were a judge in any State I should not feel myself bound to pay any attention whatever to this act; because I do not believe the Congress of the United States has the constitutional authority to pass the act. Suppose a judge of a State court should honestly be of that opinion, and suppose some Secretary of War, or the agent of some Secretary of War, or some Secretary of State, or the agent of some Secretary of State, has caused a citizen within the limits of one of the States to be arrested, and application is made to the State courts for redress, and the State courts believe they have the constitutional authority to afford that redress, notwithstanding the provisions of this act, and shall honestly so decide, your act proposes to punish them in damages for the exercise of an honest judicial opinion. I will not discuss the question, however, Mr. President, but I make the motion to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I hardly think it is worth while that I should spend much time in answering the Senator from Delaware, and I would not say a word now if this had not been the second time when he uttered words like those which he has now uttered in defiance of the authority of the United States. When the civil rights bill was upon its passage, when the Senate was about to vote on it, the Senator from Delaware, in the spirit that he now shows in the Senate, and in the hearing of the people who were here, stood up in the Senate and defied almost the authority of the United States, and said that if he were a judge, or a person acting in that capacity, in the State of Delaware, he would not obey the law. He repeats that same thing to-day. Sir, if it be so that the rebel spirit which defies the nation, in the person of judges and others, has crept into the Senate, and shows itself here, the more the necessity of the bill which we propose to pass. "I will not yield to that authority"—so said the rebel, and that produced the war; and now, when the war is over, the Senator from Delaware stands up and repeats that he will not yield to the authority of the United States. It is time this should be done with. It is time that the Senator should understand that the authority of the United States will be supreme, whether it takes a Senator or the merest rebel soldier. This Government must be obeyed, and it is not worth having if it cannot cause itself to be obeyed. This proceeding, if attempted to be carried on in a State court, in defiance of the United States authority, should be void, and the judge and everybody else who undertakes to set himself up in this way—for it will not be an honest authority—should be punished for so doing. We have had about enough of this State authority to teach it to yield respect and obedience to the laws of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I cannot possibly imagine anything I have said that should call for the very unbecoming remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. Who is he, sir, that he should attempt to lecture a Senator in this body? Sir, I assigned the reason why if I were a judge I should not carry out the provisions of this law—because I believe it to be unconstitutional. What did I say about resisting the authority of the Federal Government except in the interpretation of an act of Congress if I were sitting in a judicial capacity? Was there anything discourteous to any member of this body in what I said; anything about resisting the authority of the United States? Sir, the idea did not enter into my mind at the time, but as I stated the fact that, sitting as a judge and believing the act to be without constitutional authority, I should feel myself compelled to execute the law of my State. When the Senator gets up here and insinuates rebellion or a rebellious spirit to me, I have only this to say: that there is nothing in that Senator, mentally, morally, physically, or otherwise, that gives him the right to use insolent language here.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to use no insolent language; I shall not be discourteous, I hope, to the Senator from Delaware or any other Senator. I hope I shall not be discourteous to the Senate of the United States. I hope I shall not be discourteous to the Government of the United States. But when the Senator from Delaware, or any other Senator in this body, shall rise repeatedly, time after time, and say here in the presence of this Senate that he will not obey the authority of the United States, it is time, with due deference to him, that that spirit of the Senator, that that spirit of rebellion which crops out in that way, should be rebuked. I claim nothing morally, I claim nothing physically, I claim nothing mentally, but I do love my country, and, God aiding me, I will stand against rebellion to the bitter end of it, whether in the Senator from Delaware or in him who is now confined in Fortress Monroe.

Sir, we have had too much trouble from this spirit already. If the men who have been engaged in rebellion "accept the situation," let them accept it; but let not the same opposition and spirit be manifested in the Senate of the United States. We owe it to the people of the United States, who have stood by us through all the rebellion, that this Senate should be free from expressions of the kind and from an approval of such expressions; and if the Senator from Delaware rejoices that this rebellion is put down, let him put away the spirit which produced the rebellion, and accede to the authority of the General Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not continue this controversy with the Senator from New Hampshire. I simply rise to repeat, that there was nothing in the remark that I made to cause any member of this body to say that I was opposed to the authority of the Federal Government or of a State government. I said if I were sitting as a State judge and called upon to act, and this act was produced before me, I could not recognize it as a constitutional law. It was simply the expression of an opinion. It never occurred to me that there was an intellect in this whole country so obtuse as for a moment to suppose that there was in that any spirit of defiance to any rightful authority of this Government, State or Federal. The Senator from New Hampshire, to exhibit his own patriotism, has chosen to indulge in language unbecoming this place, and which I trust will not be repeated. Of one thing I will assure the Senator: that while I wish to cultivate kindly relations with every member of this body, both in the Senate and out of it, no imputation upon my just and proper devotion to my Government will be submitted to. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire in future to be more cautious in the use of language. Sir, the time has gone by when sensible men indulge in reflections upon the motives of others, simply because they may differ in their political views, or in their interpretations in reference to a statute, whether State or Federal. I have sought no controversy with that Senator or any other; but hereafter, as in the past, if I believe an act is unconstitutional I will say so; and I have as much confidence in my own judgment in reference to questions of that character as I have in the judgment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. I have heard the Senator's caution; but I do not abate one jot or tittle of what I have said. I meant no disrespect to him personally as a Senator, but to rebuke the spirit which is manifested here; and if I have occasion to say it again, I shall assuredly say it when the occasion calls for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment in addressing myself to the pending question rather than to the questions of spirit and feeling which have been discussed between the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Delaware. The proposition, if I understand it, is to strike out section four. All that section four provides for is the right of the removal of these causes from the State to the Federal courts. Certainly it appears to me that in respect to acts which are done under the authority of the General Government, the authority of the General Government ought to be asserted and it ought to be defended in its own courts; and such, I believe, has been the constitutional practice of the Government from its foundation. Therefore it appears to me that this section, which only provides for enforcing that right of removal to the national tribunals, is perfectly constitutional and perfectly right; and I am opposed to its being stricken out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not able to see that the reply of the Senator from New Hampshire met the point made by the Senator from Delaware. This bill addresses itself to each one of us as lawyers. It proposes to confer upon the courts of the United States jurisdiction, and to control the proceedings of the State courts in certain causes; and I was not able to see the impropriety on the part of a Senator in saying that if he were a judge in a State court he should disregard the provisions of a law which he thought to be unconstitutional. Sir, it is not clear that this proposed transfer of causes from the State courts to the Federal courts was contemplated by the Constitution; and when a similar provision found its way in what is called the civil rights bill I had the same opinion upon it. Causes such as are not described at all in the provisions of the Constitution, which defines the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, are to be transferred from the State courts to the Federal courts, merely because Congress so provides. I have my doubts whether it can properly be done. When a case is pending in a State court, and an application is made to transfer that cause to the United States court, if the judge in the State court shall be of opinion that under the Constitution of the United States that cause ought not to be transferred, I submit to the judgment of the Senator from New Hampshire, what is the clear duty of the State judge? Ought he to send the cause from his court into a Federal court, contrary to the laws and Constitution of the country? What jurisdiction shall be possessed by the Federal courts is defined in the Constitution of the United States; and I am of opinion that that definition of jurisdiction does not include the cases provided for in this bill.

But, sir, suppose it be proper to transfer these causes from the State to the Federal courts, ought the third and fourth sections of this bill to be as they are? We are all familiar with the act which authorizes the transfer of certain causes from the State to the Federal court. Where a citizen of one State brings a suit against a citizen of another State, in a State court, the act of Congress authorizes the transfer of that cause to the Federal court, upon the application of the defendant; and why? Because the Constitution of the United States provides that litigation between citizens of different States may be heard in the Federal court, which is supposed to be disinterested in judgment and feeling between the parties. But in that act we do not find such extraordinary provisions as are in this bill. In that case the defendant, upon the first day of the term, must come into the State court and make his application for the transfer before he does any act which recognizes the jurisdiction of the State court, and he must give his bond that upon the first day of the next term of the Federal court he will file the papers in the cause in the Federal court, and enter his appearance. That is required of the defendant in a cause where it is clearly proper, within the provisions of the Constitution, to take the case from the State to the Federal court.

Here, however, in a case, to say the least of it, where it is doubtful whether the transfer can be authorized by Congress, it is provided that that transfer may be asked by the defendant, after he has entered an appearance in a State court, after he has recognized, by his appearance and pleadings, the jurisdiction of the State court. And, sir, there is very strange language here, which may be construed authorizing the transfer after a judgment has been rendered in the State court. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the language found in the third section, commencing in the eighth line, and I ask him to explain to the Senate the meaning of this language:

But nothing herein contained shall be held to abridge the right of such removal after final judgment in the State court; nor shall it be necessary, in the State court, to offer or give surety for the filing of copies in the circuit court of the United States.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge the right to take the case from the State to the Federal court after judgment rendered. After the defendant has recognized the jurisdiction of the local court, after he has pleaded in that court, after he has submitted to trial by a jury, and after upon the verdict a judgment has been rendered, I want to know of the Senator whether he contemplates that there should be a transfer, and that the judgment of the State court shall be vacated and a new trial had in the United States court.

But, sir, in the existing law which authorizes the transfer of causes to the Federal from the State courts in cases that are clearly within the provisions of the Constitution, is there any provision that if the judge shall be of opinion that the case ought not to be transferred, he shall be liable to punishment, he shall be liable to suit and damages? No, sir. Congress, in the enactment upon that subject, has assumed that the State judge will do his duty. But here, almost for the first time, and I believe for the first time unless a provision like this is found in what is called the civil rights bill, it is provided that if the judge shall deny the transfer, upon the exercise of his judgment, for what Congress may hold to be an error of judgment, he shall be liable to a civil suit and to damages. Are Senators willing to say that the State judges are to be punished by suits and damages for an error of judgment?

Mr. President, these are very extraordinary provisions, and I am not at all surprised that the Senator from Delaware should express himself upon them very earnestly. The language which he used I did not observe at the time; but I am very free to say to the Senate that if I were a State judge, and I thought the provision of this law was unconstitutional, I certainly should regard the Constitution as a higher law than the act of Congress which, in my judgment, if it should be my judgment, was contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. It presents the question to a judge whether a case can be transferred to the Federal court; and shall he not decide it? If I bring a suit in a State court against a man who has done me a grievous wrong during these four or five years, a wrong perhaps accompanied with violence and malice, and the cause is set down for trial upon an appearance and plea by the defendant, and he then asks a transfer of the cause to the Federal court, and the judge shall say that the case must be heard before him and before a jury in that court, shall that judge, because of the exercise of a sound and honest judgment, be punished by suit and damages? I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he has known of any cases in which the State courts have refused under existing laws to allow a transfer where a proper case was made for a transfer? I have heard of none.

Mr. WILSON. There are a great many cases of that kind. I understand the Legislature of Kentucky has passed a law forbidding the judges of that State to allow these transfers. I understand further that there are over three thousand of these cases in that State. One officer of the Government has thirty-five cases against him. One of the judges of that State, Mr. Andrews, formerly a member of the House of Representatives, would not allow the order of the Government to the officer to be considered as any defense; he said it was no defense; and in the course of ten days afterward he discharged a rebel on the ground that his order from the rebel service was a complete defense.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not familiar with the case referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts. If the judge to whom he refers showed partiality, or that he was governed by corrupt motives, I certainly have no apology or defense to make for him. But I had not heard of any refusals by State judges to allow transfers of causes where the cases were properly presented. I know that in the State of Indiana, as far as my practice has extended, there has been no occasion to complain. If a judge has acted in Kentucky as the Senator from Massachusetts understands, then the remedy against him is by impeachment, not by a general provision that for the exercise of his judgment a judicial officer shall be liable to suit and to penalties.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator from Indiana, who is going to impeach him? Perhaps he will say, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, if he were in Kentucky. A year or two ago the Legislature of Kentucky passed an act, similar in its provisions to the one we now propose, for the rebel soldiers; and when a member of that Legislature a year after presented a resolution of a similar kind for the Union soldiers, they voted it down. They gave the rebel soldier this defense and refused it to the Union soldier. I have a copy here of the resolution which Colonel Johnson, of Kentucky, introduced. It is in these words:

"Whereas at the last session of the Legislature an act was passed granting general amnesty to all who had been connected with the rebel army; and another which was made pleadable in bar to all indictments, prosecutions, and actions against any of them for acts performed during their said connection with said rebel army: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Legislature is most respectfully requested to extend the same beneficent enactment to the Federal officer and soldier, which is but justly and fairly due to the man to whom that Legislature is now indebted for its very existence."

And they voted it down. Now, talk of an impeachment of a judge in a State like that!

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the date of that?

Mr. CLARK. There is no date upon the paper.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand it was offered at the last session of the Legislature.

Mr. CLARK. I have another case in the State of Kentucky which I will bring to the attention of the Senate. I stated here the other day that the judges in Kentucky had decided both ways; had agreed to allow an order of a rebel officer to be pleaded in a prosecution against a rebel soldier, and had held that it was for him a good defense, and had refused it to a Federal soldier. I have the case here of a person named Holland, which I will read:

"Holland was indicted by the grand jury of Christian county for stealing some horses, which act he committed under the orders of his superior officer, General S. B. Buckner, of the rebel army, and upon being brought to trial was discharged by Judge Graham, circuit judge of Christian county, on the ground that he could not be punished for an act committed under the orders of his superiors, from which the Commonwealth appealed.

"Attorney General Harlan represented the Commonwealth, and Colonel B. H. Bristow represented the prisoner, (Holland.) Judge Robertson delivered the opinion of the court:

"The only judicial question presented by this appeal from a judgment of the circuit court discharging the accused on a verdict of acquittal on an indictment for robbery is, whether in a county of Kentucky, occupied and controlled by a confederate army under command of General Buckner, the forcible capture of a non-combatant citizen's horses in conformity with military authority, and in execution of a military order, was a criminal offense cognizable by the civil power of this State, and on this question our opinion is that the act being belligerent in the legal import of that comprehensive term it was not robbery in the technical sense. Argument to prove this would be superfluous, wherefore the judgment is affirmed."

Upon this a Frankfort correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette remarks:

"This opinion was delivered on the 21st day of September, 1864, and has just been published by the reporter, Duval. Notwithstanding this opinion, some three or four thousand Union soldiers have been indicted and tried for similar offenses, and some of them sentenced to the penitentiary, and but for Governor Bramlette's intervention with his pardoning power would now be incarcerated there."

It seems that what is a good defense for a rebel soldier is not a defense for a Federal soldier, and he is cast into prison for doing precisely the same thing for which the rebel soldier is set free. I make no imputation upon the State of Kentucky; I desire to cast no imputation upon her authorities; but if there be this honest difference of opinion in her courts, if they honestly believe that a rebel soldier is to be defended and protected because he has the order of his superior, it is time that we should provide that the Federal soldier should be protected in the same way. I have further testimony; and the Senator from Indiana need not ask me if cases have been refused a transfer. Thousands of them have been, on the very ground which the Senator from Delaware sets up, and which the Senator from Indiana, I understand, has approved, that they declare the act to be unconstitutional. What defense is an act of this kind to a Federal soldier if he goes into the court, and the judge says, "Your act is entirely unconstitutional; I will not regard it for a moment;" and then goes on to try and sentence him and put him in the State prison, or else finds a judgment against him and sends the sheriff to take away his property? There must be some way of remedying this crying evil, and these men who have been engaged in the defense of the country cannot be permitted to be persecuted in this sort of way. Their life becomes hardly worth having, if, after having driven the rebels out of their country and subdued them, those rebels are to be permitted to return and harass them from morning until night and from night till morning, and make their life a curse for that very defense which they have given your country. Sir, it should not be; and if these State judges will not obey the law, if they will not allow the transfer to be made, there should be a penalty annexed which would compel them to obey and transfer the cause.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish it to be understood that I believe that a State court has authority to punish a soldier for an act done within the lines and within the scope of the war, under the command of his superior officer.

Mr. CLARK. I did not understand the Senator to say any such thing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not want it to be understood by any misunderstanding of the Senator's argument that I believe that. If a soldier in Kentucky should be indicted and arrested upon a charge of robbery for taking horses or any other property in the State of Kentucky, by virtue of a command of one of the United States officers, he being in control and possession of the country at the time, there is no question but what that would be a defense to the soldier. I do not understand whether the Senator approves or disapproves of the decision made by Judge Robertson, of the State of Kentucky; he did not say; but unquestionably that doctrine is the correct doctrine as applied to the troops of the United States. I do not doubt it; but I am not discussing what makes a crime there. I spoke simply of the proposition to transfer this class of cases to the Federal courts from the State courts—civil suits—and to punish by civil suit and damages a judge who, in the discharge of his duty according to his judgment, should refuse the transfer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I happen to have on my desk the third volume of Story's Commentaries on the Constitution. Since the discussion arose on this fourth section, I have referred to it to see if there was any authority on the question submitted by the Senator from Indiana. I find extracts from an opinion delivered in the case of Martin vs. Hunter, quoted from 1 Wheaton's Reports, page 304, in which the right of Congress to authorize the removal of cases from a State court to a court of the United States is affirmed; and the Supreme Court say:

"If, then, the right of removal be included in the appellate jurisdiction, it is only because it is one mode of exercising that power; and as Congress is not limited by the Constitution to any particular mode or time of exercising it, it may authorize a removal either before or after judgment. The time, the process, and the manner must be subject to its absolute legislative control. A writ of error is, indeed, but a process which removes the record of one court to the possession of another court, and enables the latter to inspect the proceedings and give such judgment as its own opinion of the law and justice of the case may warrant. There is nothing in the nature of the process which forbids it from being applied by the Legislature to interlocutory as well as final judgments. And if the right of removal from State courts exist before judgment, because it is included in the appellate power, it must, for the same reason, exist after judgment.

And in conclusion the court say:

"It is an historical fact that the Supreme Court of the United States have, from time to time, sustained this appellate jurisdiction in a great variety of cases brought from the tribunals of many of the most important States in the Union; and that no State tribunal has ever breathed a judicial doubt on the subject and declined to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court until the present occasion. This weight of contemporaneous exposition by all parties, this acquiescence of enlightened State courts, and these judicial decisions of the Supreme Court through so long a period, do, as we think, place the doctrine upon a foundation of authority which cannot be shaken without delivering over the subject to perpetual and irremediable doubts."

I understand that it has been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, so that the question now is regarded as finally settled, that where, in a State court, a party sued makes a defense under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, he has a right to have that cause removed at any time during its progress from the State court to a court of the United States, and there have the questions involved adjudicated. I think there can be no question, upon this authority, and upon other decisions of a like nature of the Supreme Court of the United States, as to the constitutionality of this section, because it is manifest that a military officer in the discharge of his duty is acting under the law or the authority of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the pending amendment, which is the proposition of the Senator from Delaware to strike out the fourth section of the bill, by striking out of the seventh line simply the word "judges," and then the section will remain as it now is, declaring that "all parties, officers, and other persons thenceforth proceeding thereunder, or by color thereof, shall be liable," &c. There is no necessity, in order to give full effect to this section, that you should undertake to declare that the judges who act in a judicial capacity shall be made liable. If you declare that all the parties are liable to prosecution, that the ministerial officers who act under it are liable, or any other person that volunteers to do it, you have just as good a remedy for the defense of the person as if you declare that the judges themselves are to be made responsible for what they do in a judicial capacity. It is a novel thing in the history of the United States to make the judges of a State court, who are acting judicially upon their responsibility as judges, and judging upon the validity of laws, responsible. I do not see any purpose in it, and it may make objections to the bill, which otherwise would be removed.

The question may arise, and be seriously considered, whether this bill, making a defense by act of Congress against a claim of an individual for injuries to person or property, making the order of a superior officer a defense in all cases, is or is not constitutional. If that be a question seriously raised, a judge sitting in a State court, just as much as a judge sitting in a Federal court, is called upon to act judicially. He must not act in terrorem; he must not act in fear of an indictment or in fear of a prosecution because he gives judgment one way or the other. Therefore, it seems to me it would be wise to strike out the word "judges," for I do not think it adds any strength to the section. As all the other parties are made responsible, I do not see the necessity of holding the judge personally liable in a matter where he is exercising his judgment in a judicial capacity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been several times stated in the Senate heretofore that it is a novel thing to hold a judge responsible for what he does as a judge. I have replied to that, and I have read the authority in Kent, and from the statutes of more States than one, making a judge of a court responsible for an act done by him as a judge; and why it should be represented here that this is a novel provision I am at a loss to know. I refer again, as I have it before me, to the authority as given by Kent in the first volume of his Commentaries, page 646.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. About ambassadors? Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir, it has nothing to do with ambassadors. There is a law of the United States making judges responsible for issuing writs against ambassadors when they do it in their judicial capacity. But there is a law in the State of New York, and I doubt not in the State of Wisconsin—I have not looked into the acts of Wisconsin, but I presume it is so there; if it is not, it ought to be; it is so in Mississippi, and I presume it is generally so in all the States—that makes a judge of a court while acting as a court responsible in damages and to imprisonment when he refuses to issue a writ of habeas corpus, or when he imprisons a man by judicial act who has been discharged on a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend will allow me to say that it is not when the judge acts in a judicial capacity at all. In that case he is acting simply as a commissioner would act in the issuing of a writ, and if he at chambers refuses to issue the writ he is made responsible. But, sir, if the supreme court of Illinois, or of Wisconsin, sitting as a court, on an application for habeas corpus, should judicially refuse it, does the Senator pretend that the court and the judges would be responsible and made liable to fine and imprisonment for refusing it? Not at all. I say that the bill is wholly novel, so far as that provision is concerned, when you apply it to a judge acting in his judicial capacity in a court. It is a different affair when you apply it to a judge at chambers. He is bound to act like any commissioner of the court to issue the writ.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is exactly what I mean to say; that when acting as a court, not as a commission and at chambers, the judges are made responsible; and so says Kent. I shall have the volume here in a moment, but while it is being sent for, I will read an extract which I have before me from the volume, and when I read it I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will take back all he has said.

"The penalty of $1,000"— says Kent—

"is given in favor of the party aggrieved, against every officer and every member of the court assenting to the refusal."

That is, the refusal to grant the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. COWAN. That is, to take cognizance of the case at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We will see what that is. I read now from page 616, wherein the author is treating upon the writ of habeas corpus, the great writ of right, in which he says:

"The penalty of $1,000 is given in favor of the party aggrieved, against every officer and every member of the court assenting to the refusal, if any court"

Is that a judge in chambers?

"If any court or officer authorized to grant the writ shall refuse it when legally applied for."

Is that a commissioner? If the judge refuses the writ when legally applied for, he is subjected to the penalty of $1,000. Now, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, that means when it is not in court. Is it not in court when the application is made to the court? Is not the case there? And for refusing that great writ to a party who is entitled to it, the judge is liable to this penalty. What further does Kent say? In treating still further upon this subject, and wherein he treats upon the rearrest of a party who has once been discharged by writ of habeas corpus, he says:

"And finally, if any person solely, or as a member of any court, or in execution of any order, knowingly reimprisons such party, he forfeits a penalty of $1,250 to the party aggrieved, and is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine and imprisonment."

Now, what becomes of your proposition that it must be done as a commissioner and at chambers, and the "novelty" of the proposition? What further says Kent?

"The habeas corpus act of Mississippi makes the refusal or neglect of any judge or judges to grant the writ a high misdemeanor and an impeachable offense."

Again:

"The habeas corpus act in Illinois confines the liability of the judge to a penalty for refusing to issue a writ of habeas corpus when legally applied for to a 'corrupt refusal.'"

When a party applies for the writ, and the court or any member of a court decides that he is not entitled to that writ, and if in the State of Illinois he makes a corrupt decision, he is liable to fine and imprisonment. In the State of New York it is not required by the terms of the act that it should be shown that the decision is corrupt, but any court refusing to grant the writ when a party is legally entitled to it is subject to a penalty, and any judge of a court or member of a court who knowingly reimprisons a party who has been discharged on a writ of habeas corpus is liable both to fine and imprisonment, and even to impeachment in the State of Mississippi.

Now, what is the provision in this bill? It is not to imprison the party; but the provision here is that all parties, judges, officers, and other persons thenceforth proceeding with a case, after it has been removed to the United States court, or after the proper steps have been taken for the removal of the cause to the United States court shall be liable. If a State judge undertakes, then, to act and proceed in that case, he acts without jurisdiction and he is made liable by the provisions of the bill, and he ought to be made liable; and my friend from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] says he would be liable at the common law, too.

This law that is proposed here is no such innovation, no such extraordinary provision as some gentlemen suppose. In my opinion, the main feature of the statute now proposed is nothing but a declaration of what the law is. A party is always protected in the discharge of a duty which is put upon him. The United States have authority to carry on war, to raise armies, to appoint officers, to prescribe rules and regulations for the government of the armies. One of those rules and regulations makes the private soldier and the subordinate officer obedient to his superior commander. By law, at the peril of his liberty and of his life, he is required to execute the orders issued by his superior officers. In the execution of those orders he is to be protected. The common law protects him—just as much protects the private soldier in the State of Kentucky in the execution of the order of an officer, as it protects a constable or a sheriff in the execution of a writ issued by competent authority.

But, sir, some of the State courts in these rebellious States refuse so to understand the law; they say that acts done under military authority afford no protection. Hence we propose to pass this statute declaring that the fact that the act was done by command of the superior officer in the discharge of his duty shall be a defense; and the State courts refusing so to treat it, that the United States court shall have jurisdiction of such cases. It would be the most monstrous proposition ever advocated, and utterly destructive of all government, if the citizen who is required to render obedience to the Government is not to be protected in the acts which he does in rendering that obedience. Can it be possible that the Government of the United States may call into its service and into its armies, in order to maintain the honor of the nation and the integrity of the Union, every citizen in the land, and compel him to serve, and then has no power to protect him against prosecutions for doing the acts which he was compelled by the Government to do? Sir, such cannot be the law.

But I did not rise with a view of arguing the question, but simply to reply to this assumption which has been set up here in the Senate and repeated as if it would seem that those repeating it were getting to believe it, that it was a novel thing to punish a judge. The Senator from Wisconsin tells you that there is no necessity for it; punish the officer who executes the process; pass a law and put the responsibility upon the subordinate or the officer; let the judge issue an order and let the officer, the subordinate who is to execute it, take the responsibility and decide whether it is lawful or not. Sir, I am for going to the source of iniquity. I would take the head chief who undertakes to persecute Union men for doing their duty. I would take the man who issues the order, if he does it knowingly, as he must do it if he does it after the necessary steps have been taken to remove the case to the Federal courts. I would produce no such confusion into our judicial proceedings as to place upon the subordinate, the officer who is to execute the process, the responsibility of deciding whether it is void or not. Let the man whom the States place in the judicial office act on his responsibility, and if he acts corruptly or knowingly to oppress the most insignificant Union man that in defense of his country has committed an act for which he is sued, I would hold him responsible.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, my honorable friend from Illinois seems from his tone and manner to think that he has made a very great victory in quoting from Kent, but he has not answered the point that I raised. I say that in the refusal to issue a writ of habeas corpus the officer or the persons who sit as a court denying it are not acting judicially; there is no judgment given to them, for there is no cause before them. The question of the issuance of the writ is a mere ministerial act; the law requires it to be done for the purpose of bringing the case before the court; and when the judges act on the question, whether they issue the writ or not, they do not act on any judicial discretion; they act ministerially; they act under statutes positively requiring the writ to be issued; and for what? To inquire and see whether a man is restrained of his liberty or not; and the statutes assume to punish the judges for not inquiring into the case, not for what they do when they do inquire into a case; it is for their refusing to take jurisdiction of a case in order to hear it at all. They do not have any judicial determination on the question whether the individual sits in chambers or in court—

Mr. CLARK. What judicial discretion has the judge here when directed to obey an order to transfer the cause to the United States circuit court?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Suppose the judge sitting as a court, when the question is argued and heard upon both sides as to the constitutionality of a provision of this bill, believes in his conscience that it is unconstitutional, what shall he decide? That is the question; and if he decides the one way or the other, is he to be made criminally responsible or civilly liable for his judgment? In issuing a writ of habeas corpus, there is no judgment; it is a mere ministerial act done by an officer sitting at chambers or by the judges sitting together in banc. It makes no difference whether the application is made to them in either way; there is no judgment on the question of issuing it. They do not hear any argument, and determine or pass on any question in issuing the writ in the first instance; but after the writ has been issued and the party is brought before the judge or before the court, and they have jurisdiction of the case, they are then called upon to pass judicially upon the questions involved in the habeas corpus. Does the Senator from Illinois contend that they would be liable, or any one of them liable, for proceeding in the case after they had issued the writ?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do you want an answer?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator can wait until I finish. Now, Mr. President, what I said in the beginning was, that it is a novel proceeding to punish a judge criminally or make him responsible civilly for his judgment where a case is actually before him, a question is raised, and he is called upon as a judge to decide that question either ay or no; and it is for that reason that I would strike the judges from this bill, because if it is to pass I wish to make it as acceptable and as little objectionable as possible.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A friend just hands me a newspaper to show how common a thing it is for courts to hear writs of habeas corpus and to make orders in regard to them:

"ORDER OF THE COURT.—In the United States circuit court, April term, 1865. In the matter of the petition of Charles D. Coleman for a writ of habeas corpus. This day comes the petitioner by Peter E. Bland and George E. Leighton, his attorneys, who present to the court the petition of said petitioner, this day filed herein, for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the warden of the penitentiary for the State of Missouri, for the production of the body of the said Charles D. Coleman before this court, to do, submit to, and receive whatsoever shall be considered by said court in that behalf concerning him, the said petitioner, upon the grounds and for the reasons and causes in said petition set forth; and the court having examined the said petition, and being fully advised of and concerning the same, now orders that said petition be granted, and that a writ of habeas corpus be issued as prayed for therein, returnable forthwith."

That looks a little like an order of the court; it looks a little like a judicial decision. It has that appearance. Attorneys appear in it. The Senator says attorneys never appear and the question is not argued on an application for a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did not the Senator say that the writ of habeas corpus was a ministerial act, an act where no argument is heard on granting it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say that no argument was ever heard on granting it. Sometimes arguments are heard by counsel on both sides.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is a question that is argued before and decided by the court, and not by a judge at chambers. The laws of the United and the laws in my State authorize the courts to issue writs of habeas corpus.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But it is a question on which they cannot decide judicially; one where there is no judicial discretion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a case upon which they do often refuse the writ of habeas corpus; it is not a matter which they are bound to decide one way, as is shown by the order which I have just read; it does not issue as a matter of course.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me get through. It is a great writ of right, but a party must present a case showing that he is entitled to the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He must set out in form what the statute requires.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He has got to set out what the statute requires and such circumstances as will entitle him to the writ. But the Senator says it is a ministerial act for which judges are punished, and that it is a novel thing to punish anybody for a judicial act. I remember the Senator once told an anecdote in this body which ran something like this: that on some occasion a justice of the peace had made a very extraordinary decision, and the attorney adversary to whom the decision had been made took up a volume of Blackstone and read it to the justice of the peace, showing that his decision was in direct conflict with the law as laid down in Blackstone's Commentaries. The justice replied that that was no authority for him. "No," said the lawyer; "I did not read it with the view of changing your opinion, but simply to show what a fool old Blackstone was." [Laughter.] Now, I propose to read a sentence from Kent, not with a view of changing the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin, for I do not expect to be able to do that, for he says no judge for a judicial act was ever made responsible, but I want to show him what a great fool Chancellor Kent was. [Laughter.]

"This last provision"—

Referring to the provision of the New York law for fining and imprisoning a judge of the court—

"is distinguished from that in any former statute on the same subject by applying the penal sanction to the members of any court acting judicially."

"Acting judicially," says Kent. It is distinguished from the former laws of the State of New York by applying the penalties and imprisonment to the judges acting judicially. That is what Kent says. Of course Kent did not understand the law—and of course this is a novel provision, and of course Kent did not know what "judicially" meant, and that this was necessarily a ministerial act and could not be anything else!

Now, I submit to the Senate and to the Senator from Wisconsin, whether he is not mistaken as to the novelty of this provision.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I think it would be better to get back a little on this question behind where the honorable Senator from Illinois is so exceedingly positive about it in his assertion of what the law may be in the premises. This, if I understand it, is the provision upon which the contest arises:

That if the State court shall, notwithstanding the performance of all things required for the removal of the case to the circuit court aforesaid, proceed further in said cause or prosecution before said certificate is produced, then, in that case, all such further proceedings shall be void and of none effect; and all parties, judges, officers, and other persons, thenceforth proceeding thereunder, or by color thereof, shall be liable in damages therefor to the party aggrieved, to be recovered by action in a court of the State having proper jurisdiction, or in a circuit court of the United States for the district in which such further proceedings may have been had, or where the party, officer, or other person, so offending, shall be found; and upon a recovery of damages in either court, the party plaintiff shall be entitled to double costs.

Now, Mr. President, this Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers.

Mr. HOWE, (laughingly in his seat.) I should like to see the authority for that.

Mr. COWAN. I am aware there are a great many people who do not understand that, and who really come here and attempt to be Senators of the United States, and to legislate here upon this floor as if they were members of Parliament, and as if they had omnipotent governmental power over this country. I know such gentlemen sneer; I know they snigger at this doctrine; and I know that a man has a right to snigger at his own disgrace, and at his own ignorance. He has that right, there is no doubt. I know of no provision in the Constitution which prevents a man from being just as big a fool as he pleases. [Laughter.] I do not know of any law to the contrary. But I do know that generally gentlemen and Senators ought to listen calmly and carefully to what is said on the other side, knowing the fallibility and frailty of human judgment, and that there is such a thing possible as that they may be wrong.

The Constitution of the United States says that this is a Government of delegated powers. What is meant by that? That we have just such power as is given in the Constitution by the several States and the people of the several States who compose this Union; and for fear that we should exercise any other or further powers, when we come here we are called up to your desk, sir, and required to take a solemn oath that we will support the Constitution. I am aware that oaths are used familiarly by dicers; I am aware that in some mouths they are but straws in the fire of the hot blood; but in the mouth of a Senator I suppose they mean something. I suppose that when we come here and take an oath that we will support the Constitution, we are to look to the authority that it confers upon us and will not endeavor to transcend that authority even a hair's breadth. Why? Because to do so is to transcend the will of the American people. When we are to have more authority, let the American people confer it, and then we can legislate in the premises.

Mr. President, what is the judicial authority conferred by the Constitution upon the Government of the United States of America? It is not all the judicial authority of the land unquestionably. By what warrant does your State court in Rhode Island, sir, [Mr. ANTHONY in the chair,] decide criminal causes in it? By what authority does it convict the thief of larceny, the burglar of burglary, the murderer of murder? Is it by virtue of authority derived from the United States? Is it by virtue of authority enjoyed concurrently by the United States with the State of Rhode Island? Not at all. The stupidest citizen you have knows that your State has rights as well as the United States has rights. You have the right in that State to try for offenses committed within it generally. When does the United States try for offenses committed within the State of Rhode Island? Generally? Not at all. Not generally, but particularly, where the authority is given in the Constitution. By what judicial authority do your courts in Rhode Island decide between man and man in Rhode Island? By the authority of the sovereign State of Rhode Island, and by virtue of her reserved rights which were not delegated to the United States in the Constitution. Did you, sir, ever know a man in the State of Rhode Island, did you ever know in any State of the Union two citizens of that State dragged into the United States court for a difference between them? Nobody ever heard of it, and it has remained until this day and this age that these things should be known. As to differences arising between citizens of Rhode Island, unless in the particular cases provided in the Constitution—and in the Constitution the particular cases are provided for—the United States courts have no more jurisdiction than they have over a case in Russia. If a dispute arises between a citizen of Rhode Island and a citizen of Massachusetts, the United States courts determine it; and why? Because the Constitution and the Union were made for the purpose of securing domestic tranquillity, for the purpose of settling disputes between citizens of different States which would otherwise have led to broil and trouble between States.

A citizen of Rhode Island—and, with your liberty, sir, I will take your State as being one of as small compass, perhaps, as any other—charges upon another citizen of Rhode Island a trespass. Or I might go to the State of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire and take a case from his immense State with the large amount of patriotism and love of country which he professes here, and which he is not willing to allow to my honorable friend from Delaware, a little State, too. I suppose Delaware has just about as much patriotism as New Hampshire, and I suppose, and I have always supposed, that a man from Delaware loves his country as well as the Senator from New Hampshire, although he may perhaps differ from him as to what was the proper way to manifest that love. I am sorry that upon this floor we cannot argue questions and not people. I may imitate to some extent the language of the Senator from New Hampshire when I say that I think we have had too much of that, and I think it is time that the whip had ceased to crack over the heads of the minority here, or persons who do not choose to agree with a dominant tyrannical majority. What do gentlemen suppose they can do? Terrify men into submission to the will of a majority without expressing their opinions? Gentlemen, I tell you when this Senate becomes a place where a man cannot express his opinions freely, you have not restored the Union; you have not preserved your Government; you have destroyed the very essence and the vitals of it while you were pretending to save it; you have introduced a tyranny as detestable as that from which your ancestors rescued you in the Revolution—a tyranny as detestable as prevails anywhere in the world. Let every man in the Senate speak his free thoughts, give his opinions freely, and let no man impugn his motives upon this floor.

Sir, I come back to the question I put before. What was the judicial authority granted to the United States in the Constitution? This bill provides that when a citizen of the State of Rhode Island brings an action of trespass against another citizen of Rhode Island, for a particular offense committed during the existence of the rebellion, and, if you please, in the act of suppressing the rebellion, the jurisdiction of the courts of Rhode Island shall be pushed aside, set aside, and jurisdiction of that cause given to the United States courts. I am not so dogmatic as to say that perhaps that may not be right. It is not necessary for the purposes of the argument here that I should assume, as if infallible, that that may not be right. I merely suggest a doubt, in order that I may meet the argument to the point of which I shall come directly. But, Mr. President, what I do say is that it is a question, and a question of law, as to whether the jurisdiction of the State of Rhode Island in that case can be ousted and that of the courts of the United States substituted for it. That is a question, a fair question, and I have respect for a man who argues it on this floor fairly. I have no respect for a man who assumes it to be one so exceedingly plain that nobody can mistake it.

A question, then, as I said, comes up between two citizens of this State, and one of them alleges that he was acting under the orders of the United States, that he was in the service of the United States, and that what he did in the premises he did as such servant of the United States. That, it is alleged by this bill, gives to the United States courts jurisdiction. I doubt it very much. Let us see in what cases the United States have jurisdiction; let us read it, because here it is. It is in very small compass, and any man of moderate abilities might, if he were to take the time, ascertain precisely the extent of the jurisdiction of the United States courts; and he could ascertain it from the Constitution itself, without running away to far-fetched analogies which have really no connection with the matters in hand.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls."

Because, you will observe, that when the Union was formed, all connection between the several States and foreign Powers was abandoned and given over to the new creation arising out of the whole—

"To all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands"

You observe it is particular, not general; it only applies to citizens of the same State who are "claiming lands under grants from different States," and you see how appropriate that was. If the titles to lands were to be decided in the courts of the State granting one of them, of course the trial would not be very likely to be acquiesced in. Then, in all such cases the United States was to have general jurisdiction for the purpose of public tranquillity, for the purpose of preserving the peace.

"And between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign States, citizens, or subjects."

There is the extent of it. Now, I ask any intelligent man under what part of that delegation of judicial power to the United States is claimed the right to decide between two citizens of Rhode Island or two citizens of any other State upon a question of trespass. Is that a plain question? Will any man say that that is a question upon which any man might not blunder, any man might not stumble, any man might not decide it one way or the other? Now, if I understand, what is complained of by my honorable friend from Wisconsin in this bill is, that you punish the judge for deciding that question one way as though it was a criminal offense.

Now, Mr. President, once for all in this body let me ask, is crime a fact or is crime an abstraction? Is crime a thing which has actual, potential existence in the mind of the criminal, or is it a mere creature of statute, to be made out of that which has no element of crime about it? Clearly not the latter. In order to constitute crime, there must be a criminal intent; in order to constitute a trespass, a violation of the rights of anybody which is remediable by damages there must be an intent in the mind of the person who commits it to do the wrong. You cannot make that wrong which in itself is right and fair and honest by writing it down in a book that it shall be wrong. That will not effectuate your purpose. It is complained here that a judge, honestly deciding the law as he understands it, honestly deciding the question under the Constitution and under the laws taken all together, shall be punished as a criminal. To me that proposition is monstrous; to me it has never had any place in any legislation in civilized countries, within the recent Christian era at least, I think I may say.

But it is said that a judge may be made a criminal because he will not issue a writ of habeas corpus. I am rather inclined to think he should be, but in that case he is not to be a criminal because of his decision of a legal point; it is because of his refusal to do a plain duty laid down before him by the statute. If I go to a judge and demand a writ of habeas corpus, I do not ask him to deliver me a legal opinion on it; if the writ is warranted by the statute and I bring myself within the requirements of the statute I demand it of right, and if he refuses to do it he refuses to do his duty, and that is an offense. If I am detained of my liberty and I appeal to the judge to deliver me and he will not issue the writ, that is an offense and a very high offense. It was an offense as far back as Runnymede, in the great charter. But if he issues the writ and I am brought before him and my case is heard and he decides it, no matter how improperly, how erroneously, there is no guilt in that if he was not moved by an improper purpose, which I must show, not from the statute-book, but I must show as existing in his mind an intent to do the wrong, if I want to mulct him in damages or punish him as a criminal. There is the distinction, a very clear, broad distinction, one that nobody could mistake, between the cases cited here as precedents for this extraordinary exercise of power and this case itself.

Mr. President, it might be well to inquire from whence sprang all this brood of transferring cases from the State courts to the United States courts. How did it happen that there ever was a precedent for that thing? I will try and explain that. Among other powers delegated to the United States was the power of levying taxes, imposts, duties, and so on, or in other words, to enforce a revenue system. In early times in this country there was no act of Congress taking cognizance of that revenue system and providing for the decision of cases under it; and hence, perhaps, thirty-five or thirty-six years ago, about 1830, an act of Congress was passed which provided that whenever a revenue officer in the execution of his duty collecting the revenue shall be involved in law suits with anybody about that subject, those cases should be transferred to the courts of the United States in order that he might be tried there, because the cases arose not under State laws, but under the laws of the United States. That was right and proper. Where the officer was acting under the laws of the United States, where he was executing the laws of the United States, and where the whole subject-matter was within the jurisdiction of the United States, it was eminently proper that the cause should be carried into the United States courts; but that is a very different thing from the application we have made of that rule here, and a very different thing from the later precedent which we have followed. This is not that case. This is a case where prima facie the State courts have not only clear, unquestionable jurisdiction, jurisdiction never before perhaps doubted, but where the United States, by the very terms of the instrument under which we govern the Union, have no such power. Take the Constitution and the judiciary act and read them. Let any man read them and see where he can find the authority there. The nearest he can possibly come to it is that these may be said to be cases arising under the laws of the United States. I am perfectly free to say that an argument may be made there; but I am also perfectly free to say, and I am perfectly sure in saying, that the man who decides that question one way or the other is not on account of that decision to be taken as a criminal or to be mulcted in damages because of any mistake he may make.

As my honorable friend from California [Mr. McDougall] very often says, the old fathers were wiser than we are; the men who founded this Republic, the men who made its Constitution—and "there were giants in those days"—provided much more aptly and quite as fully for this question as it was possible in the nature of things and from the machinery with which we administer our Government could be done. What did they do? They provided that whenever a defendant in any court set up a justification under the laws of the United States or under the Constitution of the United States, and the State court refused that defense, decided against it, decided against the constitutionality of the law under which he set it up, in such case he should have a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. What could be plainer and wiser? If it be true that under the laws of the United States these officers are justifiable in any particular case, where is the objection to their making that defense in the State court, and, if it is not allowed, give them the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. What can be plainer than that?

I have another word to say about the policy of this law. The danger to the Union, the danger to the existence of this fabric to-day, is quite as great as it ever was, and why? The danger is that the several constituent parts of it will not keep each within its own sphere. The danger is that the States will assume to enlarge their reserved rights, and paralyze the General Government; and on the other hand the danger is that the General Government will encroach, swallow up the State rights, and centralize and despotize—if I may be allowed to make a new word for the occasion—this Government. What is our duty? Our duty is to keep both in the line of their original creation, keep them where the fathers put them. Let the United States be supreme in all that relates to the whole; let it have no concern whatever in that which relates to the particulars. One of the great pervading principles of the Constitution was that whatever a State could do better of itself than could be done by the whole Union was not delegated to the Union; whatever the Union could do better than a single State was delegated to it, and I fancy that everything was delegated which is proper to give the States the advantages of united action. To the United States was delegated the power of making war and of dealing with foreign nations. Why? Because thirteen united weak colonies could transact that business better, and secure the public welfare, and provide for the public defense much better than they could do it separate and apart. That was the reason. Take another instance. The postal communications from one State to another are far better in the hands of the General Government than they would be in the hands of the several States, by which we should have at the present time thirty-six different and distinct post office departments in the Union, and therefore the Post Office was given to the United States. Then the power of passing naturalization laws, of removing the disability which is attendant upon being foreign born, was given to the United States, and why? Because it was a general subject, and could be better administered by them than by any other authority. The right to maintain armies and navies was given alone to the United States, and why? Because they are arms by which the general defense and mutual welfare of the whole are to be protected. And so upon consideration of the instrument which created this Government, and a careful consideration of it, it will be found, I think, to be as I have stated it, that wherever the thing to be done is for the general good of the whole, and which can be done better by the united action of the whole, and which cannot be done by the individual action of the States, there the General Government has authority; but wherever the State can administer the law, wherever the State can administer justice between her citizens, there the United States is never allowed to interfere, and she has no machinery by which she can interfere.

A very forcible illustration of that may be readily given. In order to transact the business of the people, in order to administer justice to the people in the several States, you have to have at least two or three inferior magistrates in every precinct, ward, or township. You have to have an orphans' court, a court of common pleas, a court of oyer and terminer, a court of quarter sessions, and you have sometimes to have courts of equity, in every county in every State. What for? In order that justice may be brought to the doors of the people. Now, think of the madness of executing that great governmental function, which is really and truly the very governmental function, by means of the United States machinery. The United States have no magistrates; that is, they have no justices of the peace, no "squires;" they have no county courts; they have no machinery in the world by which they can administer justice among the people except the courts created under the Constitution, one or two in a State. Think of this; and it gives us, above perhaps anything else, a better notion of the extent of the general power of the United States over the people; and when we think of the irritating effects of this kind of legislation protruding itself within the domain of State jurisdiction, where the people have always been accustomed to have justice administered, and where they have always been in the habit of relying on having it administered fairly, the question whether they will submit to it ought to make, I think, any prudent man hesitate. And if we come to reflect for one moment on the extent of the combinations that will be made against it, no matter how salutary it may be, no matter how wholesome it may be, no matter how much you may think it is required, if it is against the genius of our institutions, if it is against that which the people believe in the administration of the laws, your statutes will be wiped out, and they will never be of any avail to anybody.

Now, sir, I am, as I said, in favor by all means of protecting the officer in the honest, conscientious discharge of his duties while in the service of the United States. No man can feel the necessity of that more than I do. No man, I think, is more sensible of the annoyances, of the wrong and injury, that would be done to the faithful servant of the United States if he was to be dragged here and there and subjected to actions for what he did in the honest, conscientious discharge of his duties. At the same time when a man puts on the uniform of the United States, when he accepts her service and marches under her flag, if he is guilty of oppressing the citizen, of gratifying his private malice wantonly and without the welfare of the country constantly in view, then I have no kind of charity for such a man. I think that he is fitly and appropriately the victim of the severest laws that can be made to prevent wrong and oppression.

Sir, what is the mission of this man when he enters our service? It is to defend and protect the people, not to oppress and injure, rob and plunder them. Can anything be plainer? And if he so far forgets himself as to lend himself to wrong and injury and oppression, needlessly, ruthlessly, wantonly, and maliciously, I would have him punished, and punished severely. A double punishment should be his, because he not only shows the depravity of his own nature, but he disgraces the Government under whose flag he fights and whose commission he carries about with him.

But, Mr. President, that is neither here nor there. I suppose upon these topics nobody will differ; I am not able to see how anybody could differ upon them; but the question is, how are we to make a remedy? What is the remedy to-day? The remedy is just as well settled in the State courts and by the State law, I think, as you can possibly settle it by the United States law. If I sue a man for an act done against me while he is acting under a commission, under authority derived from the law and the Government, he justifies himself by that authority in all cases if the act is warranted by the authority. There can be no difficulty about that. The sheriff's writ is good as a justification for him against a trespass. So the commission of the soldier is good as a justification for him against a trespass. But suppose that he exceeds his authority; if he has authority to take a fort, that gives him no authority to murder prisoners of war; if he has authority to assault a town, it gives him no authority to violate women; if he has authority to march through the country, that gives him no authority to take private property without such an emergency as excuses the act, and when the emergency is an excuse for the act the court is always willing to give him the benefit of it. That is the law now. It is the law everywhere throughout the civilized world, and why? Because it is common sense.

I know that in States where the rebellion has prevailed, and in the border States where the people have been very much excited, and where they have been divided into angry, hostile parties, these actions will be frequent, and a great deal of difficulty and a great deal of trouble will arise out of them. But these are troubles which are not to be cured by legislation; not to be cured even by State legislation. They are the troubles of a community, out of which it must emerge with the trials or punishments which result from them. It must acquire wisdom from experience. After awhile the people will learn that their true interests are not promoted by the gratification of their evil passions and by the forgetfulness of the great laws of charity, man for man; and these things will be avoided; but they are not within the domain of law; they are not curable by legislation. For instance, it is utterly impossible by legislation here that we should prevent the prejudices of a jury in one section of the country from denying to one man justice and giving an over-measure of it to another. We cannot prevent that. It is utterly impossible that we can by legislation here eradicate the prejudices of judges, that we can influence their leanings. We cannot provide for that by statute. That is to be the work of time, and the gradual operation of the good sense of our people who hereafter will no doubt discover the evils and folly which exist in all this, and they will come back to that sensible, wholesome operation of their laws which is the only thing after all that we have to rely upon.

Mr. President, in conclusion I have only to say that I think it is clear, beyond question, that the judges of a court acting under State authority, acting conscientiously in deciding cases, although they may act erroneously, are not for that reason to be made criminals, nor are they to be mulcted in damages for their erroneous judgment. The remedy for that in our jurisprudence is a writ of error. If they refuse to transfer a cause from the State court to the circuit court of the United States when it is the law, and the Supreme Court of the United States shall declare it to be the law that the case shall be transferred, then the case will go there, and it will go there without staining the judge with criminality, without subjecting him as a trespasser for what may have been an honest mistake of judgment on his part.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few more words to my honorable friend from Illinois on this question of habeas corpus, and I have taken up the book from which my honorable friend read. In the State of Wisconsin, to which he referred, and which he said he presumed authorized judges sitting in term time, if they refused the writ of habeas corpus, to be fined and imprisoned or mulcted in damages for refusing the writ, he is entirely mistaken. In the State of Wisconsin it is as I stated, and as it is in a large majority of the States of this Union; the officer refusing to issue the writ in vacation, and not in term time, is made responsible. The statute of Wisconsin is as follows:

"That if any officer authorized by the provisions of this chapter to grant writs of habeas corpus shall willfully refuse to grant the writ, when legally applied for, he shall forfeit for such offense to the party aggrieved the sum of $1,000."

It is the officer, not the court sitting in term time. How is it in the State of Illinois, where the Senator himself resides, and was himself a judge of the supreme court? If the officer shall "corruptly" refuse to issue the writ he shall then be made responsible in damages.

"The habeas corpus act in Illinois," says Chancellor Kent, "confines the liability of the judge to a penalty for refusing to issue a writ of habeas corpus, when legally applied for, to a 'corrupt refusal'—not a judicial refusal, not even the decision of a ministerial officer in the refusal of the writ. How is it in the other States of the Union? In Connecticut there is no penalty imposed whatever upon a judge for refusing the writ; it is left to his judicial judgment, and the people of Connecticut and the laws of Connecticut have confidence enough in their judiciary to suppose that they will decide according to the laws of the land and the oaths which they have taken. How is it in Virginia and North Carolina? Their habeas corpus act is a copy of the habeas corpus act of England, from which we have borrowed the common law and the writ of habeas corpus; and how is it there? Are the judges sitting in term time made responsible in damages or by fine or imprisonment? Not at all; it is the judge sitting in vacation at chambers, not as a court, if he refuses the ministerial act, for it is nothing but a ministerial act to issue the writ when the statute requirements are complied with and the petition sets forth what the statute requires.

How is it in New Jersey? Precisely the same. In Maryland, I doubt not, it is the same—borrowed from the English statute. There are but two States in the Union that the Senator can point out—and the one is New York and the other Mississippi—where the Legislature has assumed to impose a fine upon judges for refusing to grant the writ in term time; and I now come to the question which originally arose between the Senator from Illinois and myself: I say the issuance of the writ is not a question of judicial discretion, even by the judges in term time. There is no judicial discretion with them but to look into the petition and see if the petition conforms to the statute; and if it does, they are bound to grant the writ. It is not a discretionary writ; it is a writ of right, to which the party has an absolute right. How is it in the State of Massachusetts? What says Chancellor Kent about Massachusetts on this subject of punishing judges for granting or refusing a writ?

"The Massachusetts habeas corpus act"—

And this is Chancellor Kent, living in New York and writing about New York and the statute of New York, comparing the statute of Massachusetts with the statute of New York, and he says:

"The Massachusetts habeas corpus act, in their revised statutes of 1835, does not contain degrading penalties hanging over the courts and judges."

Chancellor Kent, speaking of this statute of New York, which goes on to enact that the judges sitting in term time, if they refuse to grant the writ, shall still be made liable, says it is the first instance in the history of the English or American law in which any such thing has ever occurred; and he speaks of it, when he comes to speak of Massachusetts, as a degrading penalty hanging over courts and judges. But how is it even in New York? It is not an exercise of judicial discretion; and that is just the point I made in the beginning; it is not a discretionary writ, but a writ of right. What says this same authority, to which my friend referred, speaking of the habeas corpus:

"It is a writ of right which every person is entitled to ex merito justitie; but the benefit of it was in a great degree eluded in England prior to the statute of Charles II, as the judges only awarded in term time, and they assumed a discretionary power of awarding or refusing it."

Because the judges in the time of Charles II assumed to say that the granting or refusing of a writ of habeas corpus was a question of judicial discretion, "the statute of 31 Charles II, c. 2," was enacted, which by its "explicit and peremptory provisions restored the writ of habeas corpus to all the efficacy to which it was entitled at common law," and made it a writ of right, to which a man had a right, whether the court was in favor of it or not. He had only to comply with the statute in reference to the petition which he presented, and the court were to award it; and in order to enforce this right, England provided by statute that judges in vacation who should refuse to award the writ should be liable to be punished, but not the court sitting in term time.

"The penalty for refusal to grant the writ was, by the English statute, confined to the default of the chancellor or judge in vacation time."

Not sitting in court, not sitting in banc, not in term time, but in vacation time; and the only States are New York and Mississippi, which provide that the members of a court sitting in term time shall be liable to a fine for not awarding the writ; and when they sit in term time and pass upon the question they pass upon it as a writ of right upon which they have no judicial discretion any further than to look into the petition which is the basis of the application and determine whether that petition on its face makes out a case for the writ; they inquire into nothing outside of the petition. They can take proof of no fact whatever; they can only look into the petition, and if the petition reads according to the statute, they are bound to issue the writ; they are bound without any judicial discretion to do so. That is the very point in the case. What I said in the beginning and assert now is, that it is a novel proceeding to undertake to render a judge responsible in damages for what he may judicially decide.

My friend from Illinois will not understand me as being any less desirous of defending those faithful men who, in the midst of this great rebellion, have been acting in the name of the Government of the United States. I wish to defend them; I wish to throw over them the shield of this Government; and where the individual has acted in good faith under the authority of this Government, I would defend him in the name of the Government, openly and frankly, and abide the consequences. I have some serious doubts whether it is within our power to declare, as it is declared in one section of this bill, that a mere order shall constitute a defense in those places where martial law was not declared or where the operations of the Army did not so disturb the administration of the civil law in the State courts and the Federal courts as to prevent justice being done between parties. Where martial law prevails, of course, the order of the military commander is a perfect defense. There is no law where martial law exists but the law of the military power governing the place, and whatever may be done may be justified under military order. But, sir, in those places where civil law has all the while been in full play, where the courts have been open, their proceedings undisturbed by arms—whether in such courts we can by act of Congress go any further than to declare that such a military order shall constitute a prima facie defense, and change the burden of proof, is a very serious question indeed.

But, sir, I will not go into the discussion of that matter now. I only wished to discuss this single question which I have raised, whether the course I have suggested is not wiser, better, more in accordance with the whole history of legislation in England, and with the history of legislation in this country, the only pretended exception being the case of the State of New York and the State of Mississippi; and these are condemned by Chancellor Kent, the authority which the Senator from Illinois has quoted, who speaks of it as a degrading penalty hanging over courts and judges; who is opposed to it; who declares that the statute of New York is the first in the history of English law or American law which looks in the direction of punishing a judge for what he does or may not do in term time; although the act is not a discretionary act, it is an act which he is bound to do, if the petition complies with the statute, and he has no discretion to refuse the writ. I ask, is it wise to follow that example which is exceptional, contrary to the whole history of English law and American law? Is it wise for us to do it when there is no necessity for it? If the parties are made responsible; if the ministerial officers, who do not act judicially, and who always act upon their responsibility, are made liable for the damages resulting from the case being proceeded with in the State court after the removal, why is not our officer perfectly protected? I think that the act which we are about to pass will be just as efficient if we leave out the action of those who act judicially, it will be much less liable to objection in the States where it is to have force; and, in my judgment, it will be more in conformity with the history of the legislation of this country, and of that country from which we derive our laws.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, a very strenuous opposition is made to the fourth section of the bill. The honorable Senator from Delaware has moved to strike it out. Another Senator has moved an amendment to that amendment, to strike out the word "judges" in the seventh line, so as to exempt the judges of the State courts from the damages which are contemplated in the section. I am opposed to both these amendments and in favor of the passage of the bill with the fourth section in it, because I think that section contains a sound principle, and that without it there may be many cases in which great injustice may be done to parties who are brought into the State courts on claims of damages by owners of property taken for the purposes of the war. I see no constitutional difficulty whatever in the fourth section. Still I am aware that it comes within that long category of bills which the Senate have passed or endeavored to pass during the late war, which by certain gentlemen in this Chamber have been denounced as flagrantly unconstitutional. Indeed, the honorable Senator from Delaware has gone so far as to say to us that if he were a judge sitting for the purpose of administering justice between man and man in his own State, and this statute, if it should become a statute, should be presented to him, and should be insisted upon by way of defense, he would feel bound to hold it unconstitutional and void, and that he would proceed, notwithstanding this Federal statute, to pass a final judgment in the case which might be before him, and to enforce it.

It is not necessary for me to say that it is the duty of a judge, whether he occupy a high or an inferior position, as such to decide every question of law that may fairly be presented to his consideration. I am not aware that the law exempts any class of judges of courts from this high and solemn duty. Still, it does seem to me that if I were a State judge, and this question were presented to me in the form which he has suggested, certainly if a doubt hang over the question at all, I should feel it my duty to decide in favor of the validity of the statute, leaving the question finally to be determined by the court of dernier ressort, the Supreme Court of the United States, and such, I think, would be felt to be the duty of almost every well-informed State tribunal.

But, sir, is there anything in this statute which is in conflict with the Constitution? And does the judicial power of the United States as delegated in the Constitution itself cover the cases which are contemplated by the section? That is the first and principal point for us to determine. If there be a delegation of power in the Constitution covering these cases, the question of its constitutionality cannot be raised upon that issue. The Constitution declares that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c. Are the cases contemplated by section four cases arising under any law of the United States? What are they, and what is their character? It is best illustrated by a single example.

Suppose a private soldier in the State of Kentucky or Delaware, no matter where, received an order in writing, or a mere verbal order, from his superior officer in command and to whom he owed obedience, to proceed and take possession of the horse or any other article of property belonging to a citizen in the neighborhood, property deemed by the superior officer to be essential and necessary in the prosecution of his military operations; or suppose that the same soldier was directed by a similar order to proceed to demolish the dwelling-house of a resident in the neighborhood for the same purpose and under the same necessity. The soldier proceeded and executed the order; he took the horse or any other article of personal property mentioned in his order, or he proceeded and demolished the dwelling-house. He is sued in one of the local courts; he is made defendant; he is charged with committing a trespass against the property of the owner of the horse in taking and carrying away the horse, or he may be charged with demolishing the house. He is brought into court by regular appearance process; he pleads to the declaration of the complaint, whatever it may be; and his defense consists in the simple fact that he received from his superior officer a written or a verbal order to do the acts as to which the complaint is made against him. He presents the order, if it be in writing, or he proves or offers to prove the order, if it be a verbal order and not in writing. This is one of the numerous cases that have arisen during the late war. I ask the honorable Senator from Delaware and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania whether this is not a case arising under a law of the United States. It arises from military necessity; that necessity is adjudged of by the superior officer in command.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will state to the Senator a case that occurred in my own State, in the county in which I reside, and then I wish to know his opinion whether that arose under the Constitution of the United States, any law, or any treaty of the United States. A Methodist preacher was on the cars. After he left the cars he proceeded to a neighbor's house, and was asked what the news was. It was at the time when the rebels were making an attack on this city. He told them that he did not know, but he had heard a soldier say upon the cars that the report was that Washington had fallen. For making use of that remark a provost marshal visited his house, carried him against his will to the city of Wilmington, and lodged him in a place which they kept for public offenders. He was heard. There was not a particle of proof against the man, but he was made to pay an expense of some twenty or thirty dollars and allowed to return home. Now, sir, suppose that Methodist minister should institute a civil action against that provost marshal, or should cause him to be indicted in the courts of the county in which he resides, would that case arise under the Constitution, the laws, or any treaty of the United States, or would it be for a violation of the public peace of that State?

Mr. HOWARD. I was speaking within the purview of the bill: I was speaking about orders regularly issued by superior officers to inferiors, under which acts alleged to be trespasses may have been committed. That is the extent of the bill, and that is the whole extent of the bill. Now, sir, are these acts complained of acts done under a law of the United States? Certainly the Senator from Delaware cannot deny it. They were acts committed—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me one moment? I do deny, as far as any of these acts have been committed in the State of Delaware, that they have arisen under any law of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. That is not the question. I am speaking of regular acts of war performed by inferiors in obedience to the orders of their superiors. I am not speaking of willful and wanton trespasses committed by soldiers or officers without warrant and without order, because the bill contemplates no such cases, affords protection in no such cases. I am speaking of acts done under regular orders. Do those acts present cases coming under any law of the United States? That involves the question whether the war itself existed in pursuance of any law of the United States. If the war itself was waged in pursuance of law, if the Congress of the United States, in providing for its prosecution, did not transcend the Constitution itself, all these acts of war were committed under a law of the United States; and the acts themselves, taken in connection with the party plaintiff and the party defendant in the State court, constitute a case at law. A case at law must have parties; there must be a fact connected with it, there must be an allegation on one side by one party against the other in respect to which the plaintiff asks for relief or asks for judgment. That I understand to be in very brief terms a definition of a case at law.

The judicial power of the United States extends to just such cases; that is to say, it reaches them, it covers them. The judicial power of the United States may, if Congress so choose, take these cases and deal with them in any way it sees fit. If the case exists in a State court, being covered by and subject to the judicial power of the United States under the Constitution, it is competent undoubtedly for Congress to provide for the prosecution, trial, and decision of these cases in their own way. That, in brief, is all that is contemplated in this statute. But, sir, if according to the doctrine of some, if according to the teachings of a class of doctors who have been too numerous and whose teachings have been too fatal in this country, it is not competent for the Congress of the United States to wage war, as they say, against a State; if the acts of the United States in the prosecution of this war were according to the doctrines of those teachers, all void and of no effect; if a State ordinance of secession is to be the paramount law of the land, the Constitution of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding, then, sir, I agree that all these cases are not cases arising under any law of the United States, and therefore they cannot be removed from a State court in which they may happen to be brought. But, sir, I do not belong to that school of politics. I reject the whole theory of Mr. Calhoun and all his followers from beginning to end upon the question of the right of a State to secede, or the right of the Government of the United States to wage war for the purpose of putting down a rebellion or an insurrection. I hold all our acts to be perfectly valid and as valid as they were necessary.

Now, sir, as to the other amendment: it is suggested that the word "judges" should be stricken out of the section. It is alleged that it is a cruel proceeding against a judge to hold him responsible in damages for acts which he may do or assume to do in his judicial capacity. The bill has been much misunderstood; certainly it has been greatly misrepresented during this discussion. Gentlemen have imputed to it the principle that it assumes to punish a judge who proceeds after the case has been removed from him by inflicting a penalty upon him and treating him as a criminal. Not so, sir. The section speaks for itself, and speaks plainly, that if the State court shall, without standing the performance of all things required for the removal of the case to the circuit court of the United States, proceed further before the certificate of removal is produced, then, and in that case, "all such further proceedings shall be void and of none effect; and all parties, judges, officers, and other persons thenceforth proceeding thereunder, or by color thereof, shall be liable in damages therefor to the party aggrieved."

Now, what is the theory of the bill? That it is the right of the party sued, the right of the defendant in that particular case, to present his petition to the court, and upon the presentation of such petition showing that the act complained of was done by him under a military order, it shall be the duty of the State court to surcease all its proceedings and pass the case from its own jurisdiction into the hands of the circuit court of the United States. It is in the nature of an injunction against the State court, or more properly speaking, it is in the nature of a writ of prohibition, which forbids and prohibits the court to which it is addressed from proceeding further in the case.

What has the judge to complain of? It is said if he proceeds further in the case after the removal papers are presented to him or filed with him he is acting in his judicial capacity, and that it is hard and cruel and disgraceful to punish a man, even in damages, when he is acting in good faith as a judge and deciding a question of law that has come before him. That is not this case. The State judge who had the first jurisdiction of the case has before him (and he alone knows the fact) all the papers to perfect this removal of the case from the State court into the circuit court of the United States. The paper itself is to him an admonition, a perfectly full notice that from the moment he receives it he ceases to have any further jurisdiction or power over the case, and that he must not proceed further with it. It is a plain, distinct, and unmistakable notice operating upon him to divest him completely from that moment of all his jurisdiction over the case. And will Senators say that with this paper before him he can be deceived or misled as to what his duty is? Can it be said that notwithstanding the provision of the Constitution which I have quoted, notwithstanding the existence of the law, notwithstanding the petition which is to be verified by the oath of the applicant setting forth the facts which divest him of the jurisdiction, he may still go on and act in good faith and without guilt and pronounce judgment against the defendant in that case? No, sir. He has no more right in law or equity or in good morals to proceed another inch with that case than has the party who is served with an injunction in a court of equity where the writ has been properly delivered to him and the seal of the court shown him; and we all know how heavy the penalty is, or may be, against a party in a court of equity who disobeys an injunction of the court. The injunction here is the injunction of a law of the United States, which says to the State court, "Stop; go no further; the supreme power of the United States bids you to pause; it interposes its strong arm to protect the soldier or the officer whom you have before you from any judgment which you may see fit to pass upon him, and it transfers him and his case to another and a more impartial and a safer tribunal." Sir, I think there is no ground whatever for the complaints which are made in this Chamber against inflicting punishment upon the judge who persists in his guilty course after this notice has been served upon him and does these acts against his own light and knowledge.

But it is said by the Senator from Wisconsin, spare the judge; let him proceed, notwithstanding the removal of the cause, and adjudicate the case, and send the soldier to jail, and let the soldier in order to seek redress sue, not the judge who has commanded him to go to jail, but the sheriff or the constable to whom the process for his confinement to jail has been delivered. It strikes me that that is a very singular proposition indeed. Certainly that Senator is well enough acquainted with the principle of law that where a court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but still persists in proceeding to judgment against the party, the law holds that judge responsible in damages, as well as the officer who executes the void process, and a ministerial officer of the court has no protection whatever, unless in cases where the court issuing the process had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. And how in this case, let me inquire of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, is the ministerial officer to know whether the case has been removed or not? He does not keep the records. He does not inspect the papers. He has no right to look into the question whether or not the party complained against has removed the cause; and although the cause may have been removed in utter ignorance of the fact on the part of the ministerial officer, the tender morsels of the Senator from Wisconsin would go so far as to exempt the guilty judge who had issued the process in that case and punish the innocent ministerial officer for that as to which he had no knowledge and was entirely innocent. Sir, I cannot agree to any such absurdity as that. I hope that this section will not be amended in any respect.

Mr. JOHNSON. Having, as one of the Committee on the Judiciary, by whom this bill was reported, concurred with the committee in the propriety of reporting it, although perhaps there are one or two things in it that I could have wished had been omitted, I rise merely for the purpose of stating very briefly the grounds upon which I suppose we have a right to pass this bill.

In every well-regulated Government—and it is as true of a constitutional Government as of any other—nothing is more evident than that the judicial department should be coextensive with the legislative; that is to say, the former department should be able to decide upon all questions which may arise upon the legislation of the legislative department of the Government. The act of 1789, in its twenty-fifth section, was passed for the purpose of guarding against State decisions which might be found to conflict with the Constitution and laws and treaties of the United States, or found to punish or disregard in any way acts that might be done by officers of the United States acting under the authority of the United States. The policy of that provision at that time was very apparent to the men by whom the act of 1789 was passed, and that policy has been vindicated by almost the entire experience of the country from the time it was passed to the present hour. I think it is not too much to say that but for that provision our institutions would have failed. They would have failed because the rightful authority of the Government could not have been maintained; and if that authority could not have been maintained, the General Government, without the existence of which the State governments would be comparatively unable to constitute us a happy or a great people, would have been comparatively futile. That section provided that every case which might be instituted in a State court in which should be involved any question respecting the validity of a law of the United States, or the application of a constitutional provision of the United States, or of a treaty adopted under the authority of the United States, in which the decision of the State court was against the provision of the Constitution or the law or the treaty might be carried by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. The effect of that provision was merely to submit to the Supreme Court of the United States the question included within that section and nothing else.

The Senate, and especially the legal members of the Senate, are not to be told that from the act of 1789 to the time when the case of Martin vs. Hunter was decided, reported in 2 Wheaton, the constitutionality of that provision never was questioned, and its wholesome operation, I think, had proved itself to the satisfaction of all those who desired to see the rightful authority of the Government of the United States maintained. When the case of Martin vs. Hunter arose it was contended by Virginia that in a case instituted in a State court, as that was, where the final judgment had been rendered, the jurisdiction existing of course in the State court to pronounce that final judgment, it could not be carried at all—any part of it—to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error; not only because, perhaps, it was not involved in the section of the act of 1798, to which I have adverted, but because if it was, Congress had no authority to confer that power.

Upon looking at the decision of the Supreme Court in the case referred to, the Senate will find that the principal difficulty, if they had any difficulty, that the Supreme Court had to encounter was in the existence in the particular case of a final judgment. It was not doubted then, nor as far as I know has it been doubted since, that at any time from the commencement of a suit in the State court up to the rendition of a final judgment, if a question arose which involved the validity of a State law upon the ground of its being in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or the validity of a statute of the United States upon the ground that it was not authorized by the Constitution of the United States, or the validity of a treaty upon the same ground, or the validity of an authority exercised by any agent employed by the United States under the authority of the United States, it might, antecedent to judgment, be brought for examination into one of the courts of the United States.

The strict constructionists of Virginia, at the head of whom stood at that time that judicial luminary, as he may well be called, Judge Roane, were exceedingly devoted to the doctrine of State rights, and they considered the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1789 as materially interfering with the wholesome operation of that doctrine in cases which might be brought into the United States Supreme Court under that section, and as in point of fact inconsistent with the existence of their State-right notions. The effort of the Supreme Court in the decision, a portion of which has been read by my brother from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] quoted in the volume of Story's Commentaries to which he referred, was to show that the fact that the case had gone to judgment did not take from the United States the authority to examine the questions which the case involved, so far as those questions included the Constitution of the United States, or the laws of the States, upon the ground that they were not in accordance with the Constitution or the treaties or statutes of the United States. The learned judge, as I think, (independent of all mere authority to which the judgment of that tribunal is entitled,) arrives, by reasoning which is not to be resisted, at the satisfactory conclusion that there is as much authority to take a case into a court of the United States after judgment by a State court as there is to take it before judgment is pronounced. I repeat, that the authority to take it in the latter case was an authority that was never disputed.

Now, what does this bill do? We passed the act of 1863, the fifth section of which was intended to protect those who were executing authority under the United States during the rebellion. The whole country was in a state of agitation, such as perhaps no country in the world was ever before subjected to; certainly such as our country, fortunately, was never before subjected to, and I trust in Heaven never will be subjected to again. The language of that section is:

"That if any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced in any State court against any officer, civil or military, or against any other person, for any arrest or imprisonment made, or other trespasses or wrongs done or committed, or any act omitted to be done, at any time during the present rebellion, by virtue or under color of any authority derived from or exercised by or under the President of the United States, or any act of Congress, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such court or if such appearance shall have been entered before the passage of this act, then at the next session of the court in which such suit or prosecution is pending, file a petition, stating the facts and verified by affidavit, for the removal of the cause for trial at the next circuit court of the United States."

That, as the Senate sees, and as you see, Mr. President, does not provide for the case in which a judgment has been pronounced, and the question, therefore, submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the one upon which my own judgment was exercised as a member of that committee, was whether it was not advisable to make the remedy entirely coextensive with the possible mischief. For aught that we know judgments may be rendered in those cases against a party who has committed the acts, whatever they may have been, under the authority of the United States, without his having had an opportunity to make the application in time according to the provisions of the fifth section of the original act, and he may be punished, unless the case can be brought to a court of the United States, for the faithful discharge of his duty to the United States; he may be punished for having obeyed the order of a commanding officer up to the order of the President, which he had no authority, or supposed he had no authority, to refuse obedience to. It seemed to me, therefore, to be just as proper to give the power to remove a case into a court of the United States after judgment as to give the authority to remove it at any time antecedent to judgment, and that is all that is done by one of the sections of this act.

The authority, therefore, to make such a provision, I submit, with great respect to those who may entertain a different opinion, seems to me to be very clear. It assumes, as you are obliged to assume in the particular case, that the statutes of the United States already upon your statute-book are valid laws; it assumes that your officers, the President of the United States and those acting in subordination to the President of the United States, have done nothing that the laws of the United States or the Constitution of the United States will not protect them in. Assuming that, if the principle be the one which I stated in the beginning of these remarks as a principle necessary to the existence of any Government, that the judicial power of the Government must be coextensive with the legislative power of the Government, it is fit and proper that when the validity of the laws of the United States is questioned, or the validity of any authority exerted under the authority of the United States is questioned, the courts of the United States should have jurisdiction. That, I repeat, is all that is done by the third section of this act.

Now, having the power to pass that section, the next question which presented itself to the committee was, how is the party to be secured in the benefit intended to be conferred upon him by that section? He is sued, and judgment is rendered against him. He has been relying upon the Constitution of the United States; that reliance, so far as the State judiciary is concerned, has proved unavailing. He has been relying upon a law of the United States, or upon the authority of the President; and the State court has decided that his reliance fails him. Now, if we have a right—and that I will not argue again—notwithstanding the judgment, to take the case from the State court, and thereby arrest at once by displacing for a time, or absolutely, the jurisdiction of the State tribunal, the only question is, will you do anything, and if you will do anything, what will you do to render that right effectual?

Then what have we done by the fourth section? We have said that if, after an application is made to remove a case instituted in a State court, in which it is attempted to make responsible an individual for an act done under the authority of the President of the United States, the State court thinks proper, notwithstanding that removal, or that right to have a removal upon the part of the defendant, to execute the judgment; somebody is to be punished. The only question is to what extent will you carry the punishment, or rather, whom will you embrace in the class of persons who are to be punished for violating a law of the United States? If the third section is one which we have a right to pass, then the enforcing of a judgment by the State court, after the case has been taken from the State court under the authority of the third section, is an offense, if we think proper to make it an offense, because it is a violation of the statute of the United States which we have the authority to pass. How do you punish the violations of any statute of the United States? How do you punish a postmaster for violating his duty? How do you punish him who interferes with your mail? How do you punish the officers of the land? How do you punish those who interfere improperly, illegally, with your records in your civil tribunals, or with the records of the Executive Departments? And why do you punish? Because, without punishment, provisions of that sort would be practically in many cases nugatory.

Whether it is admissible to do this, is another question. Whether the whole benefit of this act would not be accomplished by omitting the judges from the operation of the fourth section, is another question. But as far as the authority to punish is concerned, why is not the judge to be punished as well as his subordinate officer? If a judge forges his records, you can punish him; if he interferes with the mail, you can punish him; if he is guilty of any corruption in his office, you can punish him, notwithstanding he is a judge. He who commits a crime, or what the law constitutes a crime legally, cannot protect himself upon the ground that he holds an official station under a State government, or under the Government of the United States. That is very clear. A judge, therefore, when a case is removed from his jurisdiction by virtue of a constitutional act of Congress, who thinks proper to enforce a judgment over which his jurisdiction has entirely ceased, is just as much liable to be punished, if the legislative department thinks proper to punish him, as he is liable to be punished if they think proper to punish him for committing any other wrongful act.

It is not the case, according to my view, of an erroneous judgment. It is a violation of a statute of the United States, which, I have a right to assume in this branch of the argument, we have the authority to pass; and, supposing we have the authority to take the case from his jurisdiction, he has no more authority to execute any judgment which he may have antecedently pronounced than he would have authority to do anything else which the laws of his State or his country prohibited him from doing. I agree with my friend from Wisconsin that perhaps it would be advisable, because it would be probably less objectionable to the State tribunals, if this law is objectionable at all—I do not think it ought to be objectionable—if the section was amended in the way proposed by my friend from Wisconsin. I did not understand him as denying that we have the authority to make the act for which the section as it now stands punishes the judge a criminal offense.

There are many reasons, Mr. President, to which I beg leave very briefly to advert before I conclude, why legislation of this kind is important. I know that many acts of very unnecessary violence, many abuses of authority, many excesses of power have been committed by those in whose hands the management of this rebellion has been placed. I believed from the first, and I believe now, that it might have been suppressed, perhaps just as effectually, by observing all the limitations to be found in the Constitution upon the authority of the several departments of the Government. I believed, however—and perhaps I may have been induced to that opinion, though I thought not at the time, and have no reason to think now that I was induced to form that opinion by any such consideration—I believed in the beginning of the rebellion that it was all-important that the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended; and at the instance of the then President of the United States I wrote an article upon the subject, after Mr. Chief Justice Taney had decided that it could not be done except by the authority of Congress, respectfully differing with the judgment of that great jurist; and that opinion was adopted by the Executive. But I may have been wrong. It would be worse than idle, it would be presumption of the highest degree for any man, and especially for one who was brought up almost at the feet of the learned judge to whom I have adverted, and whose excellence as a man, as well as his profound knowledge as a jurist, in common with all who had the same opportunity of knowing him, I acknowledge—to say that my opinion was certainly right, and his opinion was wrong. I do not know how the Supreme Court of the United States, if the question was brought before that tribunal, would decide it now. I think they would decide that the opinion which I gave was a correct one; but they might not hold that opinion. They might yield to the higher authority of the very distinguished man who has pronounced a different opinion in a case before him where the question was fairly presented. What then? Every member of your Government who has been in any way instrumental, or in any way a party in a refusal to obey the writ of habeas corpus, and who thereby defied the State power, or defied the judicial power of the United States, where an attempt has been made to exert it, would be responsible, notwithstanding he may have acted in perfect good faith, and under the honest conviction which I felt at the time—felt because I believed the power existed perhaps, but certainly felt that without the suspension of the writ, it would be exceedingly difficult to put down the rebellion as early as for the good of the country and for the sake of humanity it should be put down.

But that is not all. The President of the United States and persons acting under his authority, have established from time to time military commissions for the trial of citizens not connected with the Army. There is—I forget the particular section—in a section of the act of Congress containing the Articles of War, a provision which, considered by itself, would comprehend all who may do the acts specified in the particular section. My impression was, from the first, that that particular article was to be construed in connection with the entire articles, and that it meant only to embrace those who were connected with the Army. The Executive took a different view of it, and they established military commissions. Hundreds have been confined, some are now under confinement, several have been hung, under the authority of those commissions. I endeavored to satisfy the military commission by whom those who were charged with the assassination of the late President of the United States were tried that they had no authority to pass judgment at all. I failed. The sentences were executed. Those against whom the punishment of death was not awarded are now in confinement. Those upon whom that punishment was awarded were executed.

I cited a case in the argument to which I advert for the purpose of showing to the commission the peril in which they might place themselves if they executed anybody under that authority, the peril that the President himself and all his officers were involved in who participated in that execution; to show that if it turned out thereafter that the military commission was an illegal tribunal, they might be indicted for murder. I cited a case, never disputed, in England, which was substantially this: in one of the islands belonging to England there was a Governor Wall, in whom all power was vested, military and civil. He had some three or four hundred soldiers under his command. He got it into his head that they were about to mutiny. He was about leaving the island for home, and his paymaster was to go with him. The men's pay was largely in arrear, and they were under the impression that they would not be paid if those officers were permitted to leave the island. The result was what Governor Wall supposed, a mutiny, and he selected the man that he thought was the leader of the mutiny and ordered a drum-head court-martial upon him. The man was brought up and tried at once. Some three or four hundred lashes was the sentence. They were inflicted, and he died in consequence of the punishment. As soon as the news reached England Governor Wall was indicted. He remained away until he thought the whole matter would have been lost to recollection by time, and at the end of twenty years, when Lord Ellenborough, who afterward was at the head of the court of King's Bench, was the Attorney General, he reached England. He was tried upon the indictment for murder, convicted, and, in spite of all interposition, was hung.

Now, Mr. President, that the President of the United States who has ordered military commissions, the officers who have acted as judges in those tribunals, and those who have executed the sentences which the commissions from time to time have awarded, acted honestly, I do not doubt. They thought they had the authority. The Supreme Court has decided that they had not. They held at the last term of the court that the whole proceeding was illegal, that there was no authority either by a court-martial or by a military commission to try a civilian, unless he happened to be a spy, and that brought him within the scope of military law. I am not willing to leave the question as a matter of doubt whether the officers of the Government, high or low, who have honestly discharged their duty under an authority which they believed was ample, are liable to punishment.

Now, how are we to prevent it? Eleven of the States have been in insurrection. I differ with a good many of the members of the Senate, perhaps with most of those to whom I am immediately addressing myself; I believe that the large majority of that people are just as loyal now to the authority of the Government as we are; but there are a good many, perhaps, who are not; and there may be included in that number State judges and State officers, and they may assume jurisdiction—and they have the jurisdiction unless we interfere—to try those parties for some such offenses as these, and they may be disposed to proceed to a final and an adverse result. Now, I ask if it be in our power to avert such an end as that, ought we not to exert the power? That is all that is done by this bill; the third section securing to the party merely the right to have the case remitted to a court of the United States; and the fourth section providing a penalty for proceeding to execute a judgment in a case over which the jurisdiction of the State court has terminated. Whether it is advisable to leave in the bill the particular clause suggested by my friend from Wisconsin is another question. I think the bill would be just as satisfactory, just as productive of good results, practically, without that provision as with it; but whether with or without it, if my opinion is of any avail, I think now, as I thought when the subject was before the Committee on the Judiciary, that the constitutional power to pass it is free of all reasonable doubt.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to say but one word, and that is upon the particular amendment now before the Senate striking out the word "judges" from the section proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Delaware, the fourth section. I beg the Senate to consider who it is that has the direction of the causes in the State courts, and who it is that when the petition is filed has the power to order a stay of the action. It is the judge. Now, if the action should be stayed, and if the parties should be visited with a penalty if they attempted to proceed, why should not that judge, if he is one of the judges that desire to proceed against the authority of the United States, be visited with the penalty? Why should we make any distinction; and why should we not make a final end of the suit in the State court by enforcing the provision? I hope the amendment will not be made.

And now one word to my friend from Wisconsin, who says that the provision to proceed against a judge is a novel provision, something new; and I think he said it was unknown or new either in this country or in that country from which we derive our laws. I have before me a statute made as long ago as 16 Charles I, in the year 1640, two hundred and twenty-six years ago, which contains this remarkable provision:

"And be it further provided and enacted, That if any lord chancellor, or keeper of the great seal of England, lord treasurer, keeper of the King's privy seal, president of the council, bishop, temporal lord, privy counselor, judge or justice whatsoever, shall offend, or do anything contrary to the purport, true intent, and meaning of this law, then he or they shall for such offense forfeit the sum of £500 of lawful money."

It was at the time when the English Parliament undertook to break up the Star Chamber which had been derogatory to the liberties of the country. They feared that they should not be able to enforce the provisions of this act without a penalty, and they made a provision that if any of those judges attempted to proceed and to do what theretofore the court had done, they should be liable to that penalty. Now, we desire to break up this practice of prosecuting Union men for attempting to preserve the Government. Why should it not be done? Everybody, I think, agrees that it is desirable. The Senator from Wisconsin agrees that it is desirable. Then if these judges will proceed in the face of the law of Congress, direct and peremptory, why should they not be punished? If they do not do it, if they yield obedience to the law, they will not be visited by the punishment; but if they will act in the face and eyes of the law, why should they not, as well as the parties and officers and other persons offending, be visited with the punishment? I hope we shall retain the word "judges," and that we shall say to them that they are amenable, as well as other parties, to the law of Congress and to this penalty.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think we ought to presume that the judge of a State, in his judicial office, who by the Constitution of the United States is bound to take an oath that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and all laws made in pursuance thereof, anything contained in any State constitution or law to the contrary notwithstanding, will not violate his oath of office. It is not necessary, in order to secure the rights proposed to be secured by the bill. There can be no proceeding against an individual if there is no party to it against him; and if the party who is seeking his redress against the Union officer is restrained, if he is made liable; it is not necessary to presume in the law of Congress that the judge will commit a crime. Why is it necessary to put it in your statute?

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask, might not the State become a party, and make it a prosecution on the part of the State? Many of these cases are prosecuted in behalf of the State.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe in what is said by Judge Kent, the authority cited by the Senator from Illinois. He says, in speaking of this very thing in the statute of the State of New York, which was to defend the liberty of every citizen; speaking of the writ of habeas corpus as a writ of right; speaking as a citizen of New York, who had been a distinguished judge of New York in the supreme court and chancellor of the State, he speaks of that provision as a degrading provision in reference to the judges. He says Massachusetts imposes no such degrading penalties upon her judicial officers. None of the States do it, it seems, but New York, and Mississippi, who followed perhaps the example of New York. I would agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, if it were necessary in order to defend the Union officers, to presume that these judges would, in violation of the law, be guilty of this proceeding of which he speaks. I do not question the constitutionality of our including the judges as well as including the officers or the parties; but as a question of good policy and good legislation to stand upon the statute-book when the hour of passion has passed, I think it is by far better that we leave out the judges.

Mr. STEWART. How would you reach a case like this? An indictment has been found against one of our officers and it is before the judge. How will you prevent his having the suit prosecuted? In most of the States a nolle prosequi cannot be entered without the consent of the judge. He has a right, after the suit has been brought and an indictment found, to order the prosecution to proceed. How will you prevent him, except by a law of this kind? It is in his hands alone.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the effect of the third section is to remove the cause into the circuit court of the United States, and the circuit court which has the cause can by mandamus or certiorari—

Mr. STEWART. Suppose the judge refuses to remove the case at all from under his jurisdiction. How will you reach him?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The third section removes the cause.

Mr. STEWART. But he has jurisdiction, and he says that this act is unconstitutional, and the case shall not be removed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The third section of the bill removes the cause. It is the authority of the Government in the enactment of this section that does it.

Mr. STEWART. How will you get a certified record? He denies the constitutionality of your act to remove the cause from the State jurisdiction, and that is what you are going to punish him for. He has it under his control exclusively.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is not necessary that you should have a certified record in order to remove the cause, because by virtue of the act, when the proceedings are complied with, the cause is transferred to the circuit court.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose, then, that the judge will not give up his record, and goes on with the trial notwithstanding. You say it is removed. He says, "It is not; I have got jurisdiction, and I will continue to have the cause tried; I will not allow a nolle prosequi, even if the district attorney is willing; it is under my control exclusively;" and it is. I submit, when an indictment is found the judge may proceed with it in any State. He can disregard your entire law unless you punish him for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The third section provides:

That the right of removal from the State court into the circuit court of the United States, provided in the fifth section of the act to which this is amendatory, may be exercised after the appearance of the defendant and the filing of his plea or other defense in said court, or at any term of said court subsequent to the term when the appearance is entered, and before a jury is impaneled to try the same; but nothing herein contained shall be held to abridge the right of such removal after final judgment in the State court, &c.

The removal of the cause is independent of the judge or the court. The court cannot prevent its removal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest that the fifth section provides for the very case that the Senator from Nevada speaks of, where the clerk refuses to give a record, that the party shall appear in the court of the United States, and if the plaintiff refuses to prosecute the case, the case shall be dismissed, and that shall be a bar.

Mr. STEWART. But suppose the clerk has given a certificate; suppose all that has been done, and still the judge holds that he has the exclusive jurisdiction. Suppose that there is an indictment in a State court, and the judge says he has jurisdiction, and he is going on to try it. Who has the control of it except the judge after the indictment? Suppose he says that this bill does not operate as a removal?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator as a lawyer knows that this will be the effect of it: if the application takes away the jurisdiction of the State courts then the remedy, of course, if the plaintiff persists in the case, is in the appellate courts, and finally, on an appeal, in the Supreme Court of the United States, inasmuch as the validity of this law, an act of Congress, would be in question.

Mr. STEWART. But suppose the judge goes on and convicts the man and sends him to the penitentiary, he must lie there until the case can be heard in the Supreme Court, three or four years hence.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How can he send him to the penitentiary? No officer is allowed to do it. Will the judge put him there himself?

Mr. STEWART. The judge can order the officer to put him there.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What if he does if the officer cannot put him there? If every officer to execute a decree of the court is made responsible, how can the judge do it?

Mr. STEWART. The judge has jurisdiction over the officer, and he can order him to do it, and if he does not do it the judge can call upon the power of the State if he has jurisdiction.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make but one suggestion in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin, and that is one of fact. He says if it were necessary that these judges should be proceeded against he would not object. I hold in my hand a communication from a member of the other House from Kentucky, in which he says that all the judicial districts of Kentucky, with the exception of one, are in the hands of sympathizing judges. They entirely disregard the act to which this is an amendment. They refuse to allow the transfer, and proceed against these men as if nothing had taken place. Here is not the assumption that these judges will not do this; here is the fact that they do not do it, and it is necessary that these men should be protected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is about the hour of adjournment, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us take a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are other bills behind this which it is important for us to act upon, and we ought to dispose of this bill to-night.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will not insist on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, to strike out the word "judges," in the fourth section of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, to strike out the fourth section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope I shall not be thought hostile to this bill by offering one more amendment, which is to add to the first section the following words, which I will read:

And in any suit or prosecution to which the provisions of this act or the act to which this act is an amendment apply, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to assume and carry on the defense thereof, at the expense of the United States, and to indemnify and save harmless any defendant or respondent therein from all damages, fines, costs, and expenses arising therefrom.

I hope that this will commend itself to the good sense of the Senate as an appropriate amendment, because it secures to the soldier who, in obedience to orders, has done his duty, that protection which we all believe he is entitled to, the protection not only of the word and of the law of the Government, but the protection of its arms and its pocket, in relieving him from litigation which, even if successful, to him in the end would be almost as ruinous as defeat.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the amendment read at the desk.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure my friend from Vermont could not have understood the effect of such a provision upon the financial condition of the country. If the United States may be sued in the United States courts, there will be people who will sue the United States when they would not bring suits against individuals. The effect of this amendment is to enable anybody to sue the United States for any transaction that has occurred during the recent war, because, although John Doe, or Richard Roe, or some nominal defendant, may be made the party defendant, yet, if the United States is to assume beforehand to conduct the defense of all suits that may be brought against these persons for any acts done during the war, and then the United States is not only to pay the expense of defending the suits, but to pay the judgments of the courts in all the various suits, it would be necessary for us to consider this bill in the Committee on Finance a little while and to provide ways and means to meet the judgments that may be rendered in cases of this kind. It seems to me we had better leave the defendant upon his trial, giving him the privilege of taking the case to the United States courts, there to be tried. There may be cases where the United States may, by appropriations to be hereafter made, indemnify the defendant; but it seems to me we ought not to invite that kind of litigation. It is well known that if the United States is a defendant in a suit, even an honest jury will give a much larger verdict against the United States than as against an individual. At any rate, it seems to me a proposition of this kind to assume the defense of all these cases and to guaranty beforehand the judgment that may be rendered in them, would be rather an expensive operation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that it would be an expensive operation. The putting down a rebellion and sustaining the Government of the country is always an expensive operation; but I had supposed, from the course of this debate, that the question under consideration was, the protection of the officers of the Government at whatever cost, irrespective of any question of finance or of mere pecuniary policy. We have gone upon the theory, and the correct theory, that it is a positive and solemn duty imposed upon the Congress of the United States to protect the officers and men who have executed its authority. If that theory is correct, and in my judgment it is correct, then most certainly we ought to make that protection something more than a delusion and show. We cannot logically or justly stop by merely declaring that the man on his own account, who has obeyed our authority, shall defend himself in years of litigation at his own expense. It is not his duty to do it. If he has obeyed our orders and has executed our will, is it not our duty, above all considerations of cost, to defend him? Do we defend him when we merely impose upon him the obligation of defending himself? We have stopped his pay; we have discharged him from the Army; we have driven him to rely upon his own exertions to obtain his livelihood, and have left him in the excess and magnificence of our gratitude a lawsuit as a pension. I am not disposed to stop there. I agree that the question which my friend from Ohio has raised is serious: but I do not believe that because it is serious we ought to shirk upon some future Congress, whose opinions upon this question we cannot forecast, the responsibility at last of doing the soldier justice. Let us do it now, when we have the power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make one or two suggestions on this proposed amendment. It seems to me that its tendency would be to encourage litigation, and to induce persons who suppose they have claims growing out of the war to prosecute those claims with the assurance that any recovery would be settled by the United States because the United States makes itself responsible to the claimants. I think, in the second place, that there is danger that there may be collusion between the plaintiff and defendant. If it is understood that any judgment that may be recovered by a party when he sues another that has acted as an officer will be paid by the United States, there is danger that there may be collusion between the parties, and judgment suffered to go by default or without making the necessary defense.

It seems to me that if an officer honestly and fairly defends himself in a suit of this description and he fails, and judgment is rendered against him, upon an application to Congress he will obtain relief. I believe it is the practice of Congress, where an officer, either civil or military, undertakes faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and is subjected to expense in consequence of his efforts, to indemnify that officer upon special application, and upon such an application the facts can be examined. But to assume beforehand, while this litigation is threatened, that the United States in every case will pay the judgment that may be recovered and assume the defense of the action, it seems to me, is putting the finances of the country to some extent into the hands of private speculators and persons who might expect to make gain by these transactions.

Mr. HOWE. For a part of this amendment, it seems to me, I should vote with a good deal of pleasure. I do think that the Government, if it undertakes to protect these parties, should make that protection efficient; I do think the Government should undertake the defense of the class of cases which are provided for in this first section; and if it stopped there, if, instead of directing the Secretary of War, it directed the Attorney General to assume the defense of these cases, leaving the respondents in them to apply to Congress for the payment of the judgment, if a judgment was recovered, it seems to me I should vote for it. I do not see any objection to that. I think the Attorney General is the officer who should direct the defense rather than the Secretary of War; and I think as far as we ought to go now is to lend the aid of the prosecuting officer of the Government to the respondent in managing the defense, but to leave the question of paying any judgment, if a judgment is recovered, to the future consideration of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if it is right for us, as it seems in the judgment of the Senate to be right, to declare in advance by a decree of the Senate that the commission of any of these acts which have been performed is lawful, and therefore in effect to declare that the United States adopts and justifies every one of these acts over which the bill reaches, then where is the middle ground upon which we can rightfully pause and say, that having adopted these acts as our own, having justified them by our enactment, we will still turn the poor soldier over to the tender mercies of his own ability to carry on his lawsuit and leave him to appeal to some future representatives of the people, whose opinions toward him may not be so favorable as our own, for his final recompense? It appears to me that we cannot rightly do it. It appears to me that in the case of a soldier or an officer who is brought to answer in a tribunal of a State or in a tribunal of the United States, when we justify his act and make it our own, we ought to defend that act at our own expense, and if it turns out that the act was an invasion of private rights, so that the private citizen is lawfully entitled to redress therefor, it is we, and not the soldier or officer, who ought to make the compensation; and we ought logically and rightly, when we create the defense, to provide the means now and here of making that defense effectual.

The officer or the soldier may succeed in his defense; but how does he succeed, and at what expense? At the expense of years of litigation, at the expense of a ruin to him which is almost as complete as would be the ruin of defeat. Now, can we not trust the war branch of the Government, charged with the department of military affairs, in whose records is to be found the authority for these very acts, and under whose supervision and control every one of them has been performed? I ask, can we not trust such a Department with the supervision of this defense, and leave it to that Department to exercise the duty, as it ought to be the pleasure, of the Government and the people to see that the soldier and the officer go scot free from trouble and expense, as well as from litigation.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, the first section of this bill proceeds upon the predication that every individual who was engaged in the Army, and acted under orders of his superior was acting in the line of his duty, and acting innocently, and is entitled to protection, and we interpose it by this section, carrying it further than we did in 1863, for then we only made it a protection to the President and some of the principal officers. Now we propose to protect those who did any act under the order of any military officer of the United States holding the command of any military department, district, or place in which any—

Seizure, arrest, or imprisonment was made, done, or committed, or any acts were so omitted to be done, either by the person or officer to whom the order is addressed, or by any other person aiding or assisting him.

You grant the protection of the Government to all individuals who obeyed their superior officers; you interpose that order as a protection to them, as a defense for the acts for which they may be sued. If it so chances that they had no such orders, or that they did the acts complained of willfully and maliciously, and it is so proved to a jury, there will be verdicts against them. I have no doubt.

Now, I think we have carried this a little too far; we have made it broader than we need do. That is my principal objection to the bill. While this exemption was confined to the higher officers and the military policy of the Government, as proclaimed and ordered to be carried out by them, I thought it was fair enough and right enough. But after you have interposed these orders as a justification for your officers, and yet on trial they are convicted, I am not for paying the expenses of trial nor for paying the verdicts out of the Treasury; and I do not want it to be held out that any other Congress may be appealed to to pay those judgments. That is not a principle that I wish to establish on the heel of this civil war; and I hope that the amendment now pending will not be adopted. I think we are not prepared for it. I am perfectly certain that there are a great many places in the United States where there would be heavy verdicts against the officers if it was understood that the Government would pay them; and the plaintiffs and defendants would understand each other before they got through with these matters. I have no doubt about that.

It is a question with me whether without this act it is not a defense that the thing complained of was done under the authority of the order of a superior and that it was necessary to be done under that authority. I am sure that our district judge in Kentucky would hold it a defense that it was done in pursuance of orders of a superior. Judge Graham has been referred to as having decided that the confederate soldiers who seized property under the order of General Simon Bolivar Buckner were protected by that superior order, and Judge Robertson, of the supreme court of Kentucky, affirmed the decision, which is now before the Supreme Court of the United States, and he is one of our ablest jurists. I am sure he would not have confirmed Judge Graham's decision unless he had believed there was full foundation in law for it, and I do not believe either of them would allow a recovery where the party had the orders of a superior officer in the Federal Army. I think a man in the service of his country, and bound to obey, is protected by the order of his superior officer, and cannot be held either criminally or civilly responsible for it. He ought not to be, and that is the justification of this act.

Kentucky is a fruitful place for precedents, as I find here. I did not know when I left home that there was a single solitary suit of this character in the city of Louisville. I have heard of some suits in other parts of the State, and there have been some criminal suits. The confederate soldiers came in and they took horses and they alleged that they were sent in by their superior officers; and in some parts of the State we indicted them for stealing, and convicted them, and sent them to the penitentiary. Our Executive released all that class of men on the principle that they had acted under orders, whether right or wrong. We had both armies, as you all know, there; the confederate army was upon us, and the Federal army was upon us, and we were pretty unceremoniously treated by both sides. Then we have had guerrillas. Our people like to fight out their rights in the old way, and they love a lawsuit, I believe, for the excitement and the luxury of it, [laughter,] and we would get all right if you would just give us back the courts and let us fight it out in the tribunals. We will never get right short of them, and I do not believe the United States will get right until we restore the writ of habeas corpus, restore the right of suits for all wrongs that infringe a man's personal rights or his property. But I am decidedly against this amendment, tacking this system of expenditure at the close of the war on the finances of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have only this to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Kentucky: that I think from what I understood of his remarks that he misapprehends the scope of the amendment which I had the honor to offer. That amendment is confined literally and exactly to the scope of the enacting section of the bill, if I may so term it, and it pledges the faith of the Government to defend only those acts which are provided for in the first section, and which the friends of this bill declare, and I hope rightfully declare, are only those acts which were lawfully done pursuant to lawful authority. My amendment, therefore, only goes to the same extent that the bill itself goes, and that is to provide for the payment of whatever may be necessary to protect the officer or the soldier in the discharge of his duty, and not to provide for payment or indemnity to the officer or the soldier who exceeds his duty; and unless the first section has a construction much broader than that which has been claimed for it, the amendment which I proposed has only the construction which I give to it. That is the whole of the story. This amendment is conceived for the purpose, and it will answer the purpose, and in my judgment no other part of this bill will answer the purpose, of fulfilling the duty which this Government owes to its executive agents, who in pursuance of its authority and not in excess of its authority have executed its will.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope we shall have a vote on this bill to-night, and therefore I do not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate for more than a moment. Though I have not considered the subject very carefully, I like the purpose of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. I do not think it would be safe to adopt this amendment. I think a proposition so important in its effects upon the Treasury of the country ought to be very carefully considered by some proper committee of the body, and therefore, although I might approve of the purpose of the mover, I cannot vote for an amendment coming before us under circumstances that prevent our considering it with that care with which it ought to be considered. Therefore I shall not vote for the amendment.

But there is this view to be taken: if the officer acts under an order which is legal and right, that is a defense to him. If he acts under an order which was not legal and not right, then the man who is injured by this wrongful act ought to have some remedy; and if the officer in executing the order has acted in good faith he ought to be protected. Now, protected by whom? Protected at the expense of the honest citizen who is wronged, or protected at the expense of the Government, for whose benefit he honestly and in good faith did the act? I think at the expense of the Government, and therefore I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Vermont, in his purpose; but I cannot vote for the amendment under the circumstances.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Vermont will accept this in lieu of his amendment, I should like to have him do so; if not I will move it as an amendment to his amendment:

And in any suit or prosecution to which the provisions of this act or the act to which this act is an amendment apply, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General and of the several district attorneys of the United States in the several districts, at the request of the respondent, to assume and carry on the defense of such action, after such action shall be removed into any of the courts of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot accept the modification proposed by my friend from Wisconsin, because it fails to come up to the logical and just consequences of the bill which we are about to pass; it only goes half way. It admits our obligation to protect this man, but says we will only protect him at half expense ourselves and half expense to him, as we propose to remedy the cases of the iron-clad operations. I do not want to meet them in that way. Therefore I shall not accept the modification.

Mr. HOWE. I move this as an amendment to the amendment. ["No!" "No!"] Very well, at the suggestion of the Senators, I will let the vote be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and if that be rejected I shall offer this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. Now, I offer this to come in at the same place:

And in any suit or prosecution to which the provisions of this act, or the act to which this act is an amendment apply, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General and of the several district attorneys of the United States in the several districts, at the request of the respondent, to assume and carry on the defense of such action after such action shall be removed into any of the courts of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this amendment be adopted, the effect will be that if the defendant in any suit asserts that he did the act complained of under or by virtue of an order of an officer, that will compel the United States to assume the defense of that suit, whether the allegation be true or false. It seems to me we ought not to do so. A mere allegation beforehand of a fact of that kind, which may be false, may be known to be false, and shown to be false, ought not to compel the United States to assume the defense of that person.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio misunderstands the effect of the amendment. The question, whether the particular cause comes within the purview of the first section is determined before the cause gets into the circuit court of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; if the defendant claims that what he did was under or by virtue of an order, that authorizes the transfer of the suit to an impartial tribunal; but his mere claim to have done the act under the order of an officer ought not to require the United States to step forward and assume before the claim is settled the expense of the trial.

Mr. HOWE. The United States assume no expense whatever, except it loans the professional services of their officers in making the defense after the case gets into the Federal courts. I cannot see any objection to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest that as this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, a committee in whom we have the utmost confidence, is reported to us without any clause of this description, they not deeming that it was necessary that there should be such a provision in the bill, and this amendment not being printed, and nobody exactly understanding its full scope and effect, the Senate had better pass the bill without the amendment, and if it be necessary to adopt such a provision as this as an independent measure, let it be so presented, and let it be printed, and let us see what it is.

Mr. HOWE. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa may be a very plausible one, but I think I can defend myself against the charge of interfering with the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee, when I state the simple fact that this amendment was drawn up by a member of the Judiciary Committee. I plead that in bar. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I deem this proposition of my colleague an important one, and there is an amendment which I myself wish to propose to the first section, which I think is very important; and the question now is, shall we go on with the discussion, or shall we adjourn and take up the question hereafter?

Several SENATORS. Let us finish it now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This proposition of my colleague has a very great deal of importance, in my judgment. It does not merely concern the States that have been in rebellion, but it concerns our own States, our own provost marshals, and the men who have acted all over our States. I speak now of the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, and all the States of the North. Our provost marshals are being sued, a great many suits are being instituted against them, and it is going to be the ruin of those men who have been acting on behalf of the Government for them to go on simply with the defense of these suits. They have not the means to do it and attend to them, and there ought to be some kind of provision by which the Attorney General of the United States and the district attorneys, or somebody in behalf of the Government, should take hold of the defense of these actions that are now pending. Several actions are pending in the county where I live, against the provost marshal of the district and the officers who have acted under him, and it is no small matter whether we give over these men to these harassing prosecutions, and leave them to defend themselves as best they may.

I do not say that it would be wise for us to announce, unqualifiedly and in advance, that we should defend all cases and pay all judgments that may be recovered against them. That might not be wise for us now to announce; but I think we should assume this matter of the defense under some limitations. It may be that in addition to what my colleague's amendment proposes we might provide that the cause, on being transferred to the circuit court, should be presented to the district attorney of the United States, and if he should be satisfied that there was a bona fide defense he should then go on with the suit. There might be some qualification of that sort.

But, Mr. President, in addition to that which my colleague proposes, I have an amendment which I shall offer to the first section of the bill which I deem very important. It is not precisely like the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Vermont, and in reference to this matter of making a law of Congress an absolute defense against a wrong to person and property absolutely and unqualifiedly in States where there has been no rebellion, no martial law, and where the courts have been continually open, that is further than I am prepared to go. Upon that subject I have drawn an amendment which meets my views and which I desire to have acted on, and I deem it very important.

Several SENATORS. Read it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As I am upon the floor—

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order. I hope the Senator will allow us to get a vote on the pending amendment, and then of course he will have the opportunity to offer and discuss his amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am speaking on the pending amendment, and my amendment goes right in with it, and I suppose qualifies that section also, so that we may see how the whole section will read when we get these amendments in. The amendment which I intend to propose is:

And such order—

Referring to the order which is to be the defense—

Shall constitute in those States and Territories where martial law has not been declared, or where the administration of the civil law by the State and Federal courts has not been interrupted by the rebellion, a prima facie defense; and in cases it shall not be made to appear that such person acted under such order maliciously, corruptly, or oppressively, such defense shall be conclusive as to such person.

I want something that really is going to apply to the States where there has been no martial law. Although this section of the statute will have validity, I have no doubt, in all those sections where martial law has prevailed, and where the courts have been overturned and military law has prevailed, and operate as a good defense; yet, when you come to apply it in those States where the courts have been open all the while, and declare that it is to be a perfect and complete defense independent of whether the act is done corruptly, maliciously, or oppressively, I have very serious doubts as to the constitutional power to do it. I want to have it so that the effect will be to defend our officers in Wisconsin. It is an additional provision which I wish to add to the first section, so as to apply in California and Wisconsin as well as in the States where they have been acting under military orders in the rebellion.

Mr. CONNESS. I feel under great obligations to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin for taking care of California, of course, but I thought I was right when I rose before, and that the Senator did not intend to ask for a vote on his amendment now as a question pending. It is easily understood, and does not require a discussion by legal gentlemen. We have listened here all day to a discussion of legal questions. It has been of great interest, but there is no legal question involved in the proposition that is before the Senate now, and I trust we shall have a vote upon that, and then for one I am ready to vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the first section:

Nor for any act done with cruelty or unnecessary severity.

I do not think that I need explain this amendment. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary thinks that the class of cases contemplated by my amendment will not be included within this bill, anyhow; but it is well enough to make it certain. If this amendment be adopted, it will make the last clause of the section read:

But no such order by force of this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, shall be a defense to any suit or action for any act done or omitted to be done after the passage of this act, nor for any act done with cruelty or unnecessary severity.

Mr. CLARK. I doubt the propriety of adopting this amendment here, as it refers to the act that we passed in 1863 as well as to this. I think that is the meaning of the law, that a court would not hold a man to be exculpated under an order of that kind if he exercised unnecessary cruelty. I think it had better stand as it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely right. If we now say that the law shall not apply to this, another Senator may propose that it shall not apply to some other thing, and so on. Of course it will not apply to such a case as is supposed. This law, like all others, is to receive a reasonable and fair construction; and no court would hold that a man is to be protected in excessive cruelty in the execution of an order. That is not a fair meaning of the law. None of us would justify such things. If we commence making this class of exceptions, I do not know where it will stop. I think the amendment had better not be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it had better be adopted. The other day the Senator from Illinois made a very able argument to the Senate, assuming, in the first place, that the law of the land was as he proposed to declare it, and yet because it was not entirely clear, because there was some difference of opinion upon it, he proposed to declare what the law was. That was in relation to the citizenship of the colored people of this country. He admitted that they were citizens already, but there was a dispute about it, and so that there should be no question about it thereafter, he proposed the law; therefore, he said that the veto of the President ought to be overruled. Now, sir, I say that it is not altogether clear. Does Congress intend to defend men who have gone on under orders of superior officers and done things cruelly and with unnecessary severity? Do you intend to step between the injured man and the wrong-doer when he pretends to defend himself under an order of a superior officer, if he has executed that order with cruelty and unnecessary severity? Although the law may possibly be construed, as the Senator says, yet there is no objection to saying so. It will not cost so much to print these words, if the Senate wants them in the bill. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the vote is taken I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that his amendment perhaps only covers personal wrongs. I should like him to amend it so as to comprehend also property.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Insert "maliciously or."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will modify it by inserting "with malice." The amendment now reads "nor for any act done with malice, cruelty, or unnecessary severity."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Edmunds, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Foster, Howard, Kirkwood, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Sherman, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That amendment, I think, substantially covers the same point which was embraced in the amendment I proposed to offer; so I shall not offer mine.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPRAGUE, (when the name of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, was called.) The Senator from Kansas, who sits next to me, desired me to say that he is paired off with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. RIDDLE.] If present, he would vote in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was requested by the Senator from California [Mr. McDUGALL] to say that if he were here to vote he would vote in the negative.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Guthrie, Hendricks, and Saulsbury—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Sherman, and Wright—15.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 500) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 504) for the relief of Ishmael Day; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 150) for the relief of Theodore G. Eiswald.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

REGISTERS TO VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up Senate bill No. 89, returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was in line four of the Senate amendment to strike out the words "now called the Roamer."

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 500) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 504) for the relief of Ishmael Day—to the Committee on Claims.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore—to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 20, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE F. MAGOUN, President of Iowa College.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated as the regular order of business the calling of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Mines and Mining.

ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee of Accounts, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be allowed to employ an additional clerk in his office during the present session of Congress at a salary of $125 per month.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the occasion of this resolution?

Mr. ROLLINS. This resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts several weeks ago, and after careful examination the committee came to the unanimous conclusion that it was best that the allowance should be made of an additional clerk during the present session. He asked for an annual appointment, but the committee recommend it only during the present session, which will be for a very short time.

I have a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms, which I will send to the desk and have read.

Mr. UPSON. When does the clerkship commence?

Mr. ROLLINS. During the present session.

Mr. UPSON. At the beginning of it, or now?

Mr. ROLLINS. Let the resolution be read. The resolution was again read.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will modify it by having it read "from and after the 1st of April."

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following reasons why the resolution introduced by Hon. G. W. ANDERSON, chairman of the Committee on Mileage, and referred to your committee, authorizing the employment of an additional clerk in my office, should receive the favorable consideration of the committee and of the House:

The clerical labor incident to the present system of keeping deposit accounts with each member, with the necessary checks and daily balance-sheets, and the collection and payment of the internal revenue tax, has more than doubled since the passage of the revenue law.

In addition to the above increased labor at the present time, an examination of former "mileage reports" and routes, in order to enable the committee to equalize the mileage lists, has thrown so much additional labor upon this office that the present force of one clerk and one messenger cannot properly do the work.

I would therefore earnestly request that I may be allowed one additional clerk, with a salary of $1,500 per annum. This increased expenditure will amount to but little more than the percentage allowed to collectors on the same amount of revenue that is collected and paid into the Treasury from this office, for which I cannot by law receive any compensation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. ORDWAY,

Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives.

Hon. E. H. ROLLINS,
Chairman of Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have no particular objection to the passage of this resolution for the employment of this additional officer, provided that it is necessary, but I wish to bring to the attention of the House the fact that there is now employed, or rather engaged, in the post office, a lad who is very efficient and industrious, working from early morning till late at night, and there is no provision, I understand, for his payment. I desire, therefore, knowing the services of this lad, having it directly under my own observation, to add an amendment that the postmaster be authorized, from this date until otherwise ordered, to pay that lad the wages of a page upon the floor of this House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know the circumstances under which this lad is employed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. By no authority, as I understand; but he is the son of the postmaster of the House, and the employes not being equal to the service required, this lad volunteered to assist. He takes a deep interest in the discharge of the duties, and is very faithful.

Mr. CONKLING. What does he do?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. He delivers the mail at my house every morning, and he is engaged during the day every thirty minutes in carrying the mails out from this office to the sub-offices in the city.

Mr. CONKLING. I should not like to say anything by way of complaint of the post office, or of anybody who delivers the mail. But if the person to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] refers as delivering his mail is the same who delivers, or omits to deliver, my mail, I hope that a very moderate compensation will be fixed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] if it is a boy who delivers his mail.

Mr. CONKLING. I am sure I do not know. It must be a very small boy that delivers it sometimes, so small that with the naked eye we have very great difficulty in finding him.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know anything about this small boy that is spoken of as being in the post office of this House. But I do know that we had there one of the best men I ever knew, by the name of William Tudge; and I know that almost every member of this House signed an application to the postmaster of this House to continue him in that office. And I know that the postmaster in place of that turned him out. Now, I would like to have some better reason assigned for giving additional force to the postmaster, before I give any more patronage to a man who thus abuses it.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is evident that members want to discuss everything but the resolution pending before the House. I decline to yield to any further discussion of other matters. If any gentleman has any remarks upon this resolution I will yield.

Mr. ANCONA. I would inquire of the Chair how this resolution came before the House.

The SPEAKER. It was reported regularly from the Committee of Accounts when it was called in its order.

Mr. ROLLINS. The resolution was introduced, I believe, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] and referred by order of the House to the Committee of Accounts. After a careful examination by the committee they have reported unanimously in favor of the resolution as modified. The duties imposed upon the clerk of the Sergeant-at-Arms, as stated in the letter he has submitted to the committee, are nearly double, in my judgment, what they formerly were. And all who are familiar with the duties devolved upon that clerk will readily come to the conclusion, I think, that this request is just.

Mr. FINCK. I am opposed to the passage of this resolution; I do not believe that there is any necessity whatever for the appointment of an additional clerk in the Sergeant-at-Arms's office. It is known to the members of this House that the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms's office, ever since its organization, have been carried on with the same force that it has at present. The Sergeant-at-Arms of this House has been favored with the services of an assistant of the highest business character and qualifications. He keeps the books and the accounts of the members. And if another clerk is added he will not aid the clerk now there in any respect whatever.

It is very well known to this House that during the Thirty-Eighth Congress no more force was in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms than there is there at present. Now, from my observation of that office, and the business connected with it, I have no hesitation in stating that the present force is sufficient to discharge all the duties of that office. If they do not now receive sufficient compensation, then bring in a proposition to give them a greater compensation. But if you appoint an additional clerk for this session of Congress, he will be continued during the next session, and it will be followed as a precedent hereafter. I hope the resolution will not pass.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a word or two in reply to what has been said by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] I desire to say to him that two wrongs do not make a right. Because this clerk, Mr. Tudge, was removed, that is no reason why this boy should not be paid. I joined with others in the recommendation that Mr. Tudge should be retained; perhaps that was one reason for his removal; I do not know how that is. But here is a boy employed, and I ask simply that he shall be paid for his services the same wages that are given to our pages.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will suggest to the gentleman that he can best accomplish his object by introducing an independent resolution, and having it referred to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. I believe it is necessary for the proper management of the affairs of the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms that he should have this additional assistance.

Mr. SMITH. I do not wish to have attributed to myself anything that belongs to another, and especially I do not wish to steal the thunder of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON.] He, not I, introduced this resolution.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yes, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Mileage, introduced the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire that the passage of this resolution shall not be affected by the indorsement of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.] [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. I wish to state also for the consideration of the House, that the matter of mileage has occasioned additional labor on the part of the Sergeant-at-Arms. During the last session, before the matter of mileage was properly adjusted, the Sergeant-at-Arms advanced mileage to various members, trusting to circumstances for his pay. I move the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 51, noes 33; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. ROLLINS and ANCONA.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; which was upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FINCK called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FINCK called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSANGER IN HOUSE LIBRARY.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the pay of William H. Smith, messenger in the House library, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $2 50 per day, beginning February 1, 1866.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to yield to me, that we may do an act of justice to a colored boy connected with the bathing-room who faithfully waits upon all the visitors there.

Mr. ROLLINS. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And that Sandy Bruce, Jr., be allowed at the rate of $1 50 per day for his services in the bath-room, commencing with the present session.

Mr. ROLLINS called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISHMAEL DAY.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Ishmael Day, praying compensation for the destruction of his property by rebel raiders on the 12th of April, 1864, reported a bill for the relief of Ishmael Day; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that, as a recognition of the heroism of Ishmael Day, of Baltimore county, Maryland, and as compensation for the loss of all his property in defending the national flag from an attack by rebel raiders on the 12th day of July, 1864, there be paid to Ishmael Day, annually from July 12, 1864, during his life, the sum of $421 50, to be paid in semi-annual payments.

The report, which was read, states that the petitioner, aged seventy-two years, and loyal to the Government of the United States, had his property, consisting of a dwelling-house, out-houses, and personal property, to the value of $7,025, burned and destroyed on July 12, 1864, under the following circumstances:

Early on the morning of that day, as was his custom, he elevated and unfurled the flag of the United States in front of his door-steps as an insignia of his principles. Soon thereafter, while it was waving there, one hundred and fifty of Gilmore's raiders approached the premises, while two of the men in advance of the main squad of the enemy, seized the flag-staff and jerked it down, cursing and calling the flag "a damned old rag." At this juncture old Ishmael Day rushed instantly up stairs, where he kept two guns loaded, seized one, shot and killed the traitor who had insulted the national flag, and immediately, with the other gun, he pursued the remaining rebel, who succeeded in making his escape. Very soon the whole party of raiders came upon the old man, threatened his life, and burned and destroyed his property, being all that he possessed in the world.

The matter was presented to the consideration of the late President of the United States, who directed that the amount of the loss sustained by the petitioner should be collected by military order and assessment by a levy upon the property of disloyal, rebel sympathizers of the vicinity. But this order, for some reason unknown, was never executed; nor has the petitioner ever received any compensation for any part of his loss in thus defending his country's flag.

The constitutional convention of Maryland, which met soon after Day's display of patriotism and loyalty, passed by a large majority the following:

"Ordered, That the thanks of this convention, representing as it does the people of Maryland, are hereby tendered to the old citizen and patriot of Baltimore county, Ishmael Day, for his heroic and gallant act in shooting down the traitor who dared to pull down his country's flag which he had raised as an evidence of his loyalty and patriotism, which act of daring heroism meets the approbation of the heart and conscience of every loyal citizen of Maryland."

The committee state that they are satisfied that Day needs the amount asked to provide for his comfortable support during the remainder of his days. In recommending a favorable consideration of the claim, they base their action upon the extraordinary and peculiar circumstances of the case; and in view of the example to the community at that critical period of the country, they deem it but just to this brave and aged patriot that his gallant deed should receive the especial notice and recognition of Congress and the country, and that compensation in a measure for the loss he actually sustained should be made.

The committee further state that they do not regard a recommendation of this claim as establishing any precedent for the payment of other claims for damages resulting from the ravages of war.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should like to have read the resolution adopted by the House on the report of this committee, which forbids any claim of this kind going to that committee.

Mr. WARD. I will answer the gentleman if he will allow me. That resolution applied only to the States that had been in the rebellion. It does not of course apply to Maryland.

Mr. LOAN. Mr. Speaker, I would cheerfully support this measure if I could do so consistently; but this same Committee of Claims, in the case of a lady from Springfield, Missouri, who lost all of her property of every character and description by the ravages of war, who also lost her husband and has been left penniless with six children to support, reported adversely to it under the rule which they established. If a claim of that kind could not receive a favorable consideration, I do not see why we should make an exception in this case. I think it should fare the common fate and be rejected like all the others.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Claims have not been lavish of their favors, as the House will bear witness. They have felt, as the guardians of the public Treasury at this critical time in our affairs financially, we should be careful what kind of claims they should allow or recommend to the House. They have chosen to be just rather than to be generous, and hence a great many claims appealing strongly to our sympathy and patriotism have been rejected by the committee, not because of unwillingness to give relief in these cases, but because of the condition of our finances and because they would establish a precedent which might involve the country in the payment of large amounts of money.

The committee felt that in this case, in the case of this old man of seventy-four years of age, who, in the midst of that treacherous community in which he lived, remained firm and true to the flag of his country; who never retired at night but he prayed a prayer for our imperiled nation and never rose in the morning but he raised the flag over his door-step; who, when that flag was torn down by a ruthless hand, shot the traitor who did it; and who in consequence of that act was sent forth in his old age to wander upon the face of the earth without a roof to shelter him—in this case the committee thought they were justified in presenting this bill and report.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, when in the outbreak of the rebellion, when the Union was in jeopardy from traitors North and South and in foreign countries, and even when the Administration seemed to be conspiring to overthrow the Government, that the first inspiration we had from official circles, the first word of encouragement from Washington which sent a thrill of joy to every patriotic heart, was the injunction of General John A. Dix to his subordinates, "Whoever shall haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." That injunction has become "as familiar as household words." It has rendered his name immortal. Old Ishmael Day obeyed that injunction and shot the traitor on the spot. Allow me to express the fervent hope, through all the perils which shall beset our national life in coming ages, may this injunction be remembered and the example of old Ishmael Day shine out to fire the hearts and inspire the arms of our people to the latest generation. I think we should stamp upon this act the seal of our approbation. I hope there will be no dissenting voice.

Mr. UPSON. Is this to pay for property destroyed by rebels?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is for shooting down a traitor.

Mr. UPSON. On what principle is it proposed to establish this precedent, and how is it to be carried out?

Mr. WARD. He has shot down a traitor for hauling down the American flag. I would sustain every one who sustained the American flag in that way. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROGERS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DELANO. I see that in some parts of the House this question is not exactly understood. The rule of the committee is to reject all claims for damages that are the result of the ravages of war. This man was a loser to the amount of some seven or eight thousand dollars, perhaps more. The committee felt that they could do nothing for him, but that his circumstances were peculiar, his act noble, and such as commended itself to the hearts of every one. Under these circumstances they proposed to submit to this House the propriety of giving this old man for the remaining years of his life, that are fast running out, who in his old age exhibited this high degree of gallantry and patriotism, a small pension. It is $400 a year. Let us give him something. If $400 is too much reduce it, but I think it is not too much.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understood it was for property destroyed by the rebels.

Mr. DELANO. I knew very well that the question was not understood, and therefore I made this explanation.

Several MEMBERS. We will go for it now.

Mr. WARD. I now move the previous question.

Mr. HALE. A single suggestion. If this is a pension bill it ought to go to the Committee on Pensions.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 13, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Broomall, Buckland, Budy, Reader, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Davis, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Fitch, Garfield, Goodyear, Abner C. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Trimble, Van Aernam, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—63.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, stated that his colleague, Mr. NOELL, was confined to his house by sickness.

Mr. BROOMALL stated that Mr. STARR was detained at his house by sickness.

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, was detained at his house by sickness, and that Mr. DENISON had paired with Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN WELLS AND SONS.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution for the relief of John Wells & Sons.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the remission of so much of the penalty incurred by reason of the failure of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore, to complete their contract in 1863 for repairing the steamer City of Albany, as may not be covered by the actual loss of the Government by reason of the delay in the completion of the said steamer in accordance with the strict terms of the contract.

Mr. DELANO. There is a written report, but I can give the House the facts of the case, and then gentlemen may call for the reading of the report if they choose.

The memorialists contracted for the repair of this steamer, with a penalty in the contract of $200 a day for every day that might transpire beyond the time agreed upon for the completion of the repairs. Various circumstances, over which the contractors had not altogether a control, caused a delay of forty-five days, so that the penalty amounted to $9,000, and the entire contract price was only $7,335. The difference between those two sums, namely, $1,675, has been paid under protest.

Now, the examination shows to the satisfaction of the committee that it turns out that the vessel was not required for service during the interval of time, and that the Government did not actually sustain any damage for the want of its use. It seemed to the committee unjust to demand the bond, Shylock-like, for this penalty; and yet they did not feel disposed to decide that there were no damages sustained by the Government. They, therefore, refer the matter to the Government to say how much actual damages they sustained by reason of the delay in furnishing the vessel, and they allow so much of the penalty to be remitted as was not covered by actual loss.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that the purport of this joint resolution?

Mr. DELANO. That is its purport, and its language is clear and explicit, and that is all there is in the case.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THEODORE G. EISWALD.

Mr. DELANO also, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 250, for the relief of Theodore G. Eiswald.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and pay to Theodore G. Eiswald, of Providence, Rhode Island, two United States seven-thirty bonds of $1,000 each, with coupons attached, in lieu of two such bonds owned by him and destroyed by fire, the charred remains thereof being now deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, the claimant being required to execute a bond to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury indemnifying the United States against any loss, cost, or damages on account of the issuing of such bonds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have the report read in this case if there be one.

Mr. DELANO. There is a Senate report, but I can give the gentleman from Illinois a briefer statement of the facts.

The evidence is clear that two seven-thirty bonds of $1,000 each, by having been accidentally placed in an exposed position on a stove, were burnt, that the charred remains were taken to the Treasury Department, and that the bonds were identified by their numbers. That is attested by the certificate of the officers. The proof of the destruction and also of the identity of the bonds is perfectly clear. The Department itself is satisfied that it is proper that a law should be passed authorizing these bonds to be renewed.

I desire to say here to the House that this subject is one which has given the Committee of Claims great anxiety, and that their rule is to recommend, in the first place, the duplicating of no bond without the most perfect and satisfactory proof of its destruction; and they have gone further and refused to authorize the duplicating of any securities issued by the Government that come under the class of circulation, including compound-interest notes. The committee recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the Committee of Claims will be again called next Friday.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Commerce, in considering the river and harbor bill, desire some information from the War Department. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the following official reports:

1. Report of mixed board of engineers and naval officers, of which Commodore Latimer was president, and Majors Chase, Barnard, and Beauregard were members, in 1851 or 1852.

2. The report of Major Beauregard in 1852 or in 1853 relative to success of tow-boat company in deepening Southwest Pass as per contract.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John B. Chapman, and the same was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PUBLIC PRINTING APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a small bill making appropriation for a deficiency in the appropriations for the public printing. I understand that the money is needed this month.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 500, making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing for the year ending June 30, 1866.

The bill was read by clauses for amendment, but no amendments were offered.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the committee will lay aside this bill and take up House bill No. 211, to authorize the President to appoint certain officers of his household and fixing their duties. The bill has been in the committee for a long time, and it will take but ten minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the committee will not proceed to any other business. I yielded to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations only to dispose of the one bill.

Mr. SPALDING. This bill will not take more than ten minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will take much more time than that, I am sure.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist on my motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 500, making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the public printing for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The following section was under consideration:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Adjutant-General's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the number of officers now authorized by law, namely, one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; four adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; and thirteen adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grade of major, no appointment shall be made to fill such vacancy until the number of majors in the department shall be reduced to ten, to which number the said grade shall thereafter be limited.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. THAYER to strike out all of the section after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the Adjutant General's department shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, and their rank shall be as follows, namely: one adjutant general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; four assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; five assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels; and ten assistant adjutant generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the vote is taken upon the substitute, I will move, for the purpose of perfecting the section, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to vacate the commission of any officer now commissioned as assistant adjutant general, but only to change the title to adjutant, in the case of those who rank as lieutenant colonels and majors, without affecting in any way their relative position, or the time from which they take such rank.

Those of the members of the House who remember the discussion upon this subject yesterday, will see that the amendment I have offered removes the objection which was made, that there might by some possibility be a construction of the law, if this bill should be passed as reported by the committee, so as to legislate out of office these particular gentlemen.

There was one other objection to the section made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] upon which I wish to make a very brief comment. It has been the object of the committee throughout to legislate, not with reference to persons, but with a view of establishing an Army system, having reference to all the various departments of that Army. For that reason, in fixing these bureaus, the committee have adopted this language in regard to each department of the staff—"shall hereafter consist of the number of officers now authorized by law." The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that that is wrong, that it ought to be made to read, "shall consist of the officers now authorized by law." In other words, we are asked to legislate with a view to particular incumbents, to the class of persons who now hold the offices.

Now, I should like to know from the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. THAYER,] who is learned in the law, what will become of this department when all these officers die or resign. If you decide that this department shall consist of these particular officers it cannot consist of any other officers. Now, we prefer that the department shall consist of a certain number of officers for all time to come; and that when the offices shall be vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise, the number shall be kept full by subsequent appointments, except wherein we have otherwise provided. As we are to have the application of nice construction of law, I repeat that if you legislate that the departments shall consist of certain officers who now hold certain positions, nobody else can hold those positions until you change the law so as to let others in.

Then, again, the last part of the section which it is proposed to strike out provides for a decrease of the Adjutant General's force hereafter as vacancies shall occur. Now, I do not wish to be repeating arguments which have been already submitted to the House any further than may seem to be absolutely necessary. But I will say this in reference to that and kindred propositions contained in other sections relating to the bureaus; we have been satisfied, in reference to many of these bureaus, that the gradual increase of their numbers has been carried beyond the necessities of the Army; we have been satisfied that this is the continual tendency of legislation, and we think that a great many of the duties of this bureau, as well as of other military bureaus, might just as well be performed by men who have not received a full military education.

Now, the proposition to strike out the section includes that restriction of the number of majors hereafter to ten, which is but a small reduction in the Adjutant General's department. There is a larger reduction proposed in regard to some of the other bureaus, to which the House may or may not agree, according as they shall or shall not concur in the recommendations of the committee. But the general opinion of the committee is that there are but few officers needed here at headquarters, such as the chief of the department, and some proper assistants to supervise, direct, and control the affairs of the department. Our opinion is that you do not need officers with a military education to remain here month after month, and year after year, to be compelled to remain here as some of them have been, to perform clerical duties. That general feature runs through the whole bill; and the remark is as applicable to other bureaus, and still more applicable to some of them than to the Adjutant General's department.

I hope, therefore, that the section will not be stricken out, but that the gentleman will withdraw his objection to it. The amendment which I propose certainly removes most of the objections which have been urged against the section. I trust that the amendment will be adopted, and that the section will not be stricken out, carrying with it all this wholesome legislation, as we intended it to be, restricting the number of officers in that bureau.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not understand by what kind of arithmetic my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, makes it out that, while when the Army was only eleven thousand there was a demand for fourteen officers in the Adjutant General's Bureau, yet, when we have an army of eighty thousand there should not be more than twenty of these officers; and it is even proposed to cut the number down to seventeen. Instead of increasing the officers of the Adjutant General's Bureau fourfold, as you propose to increase the regular Army, you do not propose to make an increase of fifty per cent. in the number of officers engaged in that bureau.

One word now as to the nomenclature. The gentleman from Ohio desires that all officers below a certain rank shall be called adjutants. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it will be found to be true, as a general principle, that wherever a usage has grown up in the Army, whether with reference to titles or anything else, you will find, when you go to the bottom of the matter, that there is some good reason for this usage; and it is not safe to abolish such usages without full inquiry. Suppose, now, that this proposition should prevail, and that one of these adjutants should be detailed on the staff of a brigadier general commanding at St. Louis. Well, there are two or three regiments there, each having its adjutant. Then there are the post adjutants. These are all adjutants. There is no officer there directly connected with the staff department at Washington, known as the assistant adjutant general.

Now, in the military department there is no officer whose position, as connected with the War Department at Washington while upon the staff of a brigadier general, is better understood than an assistant adjutant general. It means a specific thing in the military service. It is not to be confounded with post adjutant or regimental adjutant. If you change the name, as the gentleman from Ohio desires, you only lead to confusion.

Mr. SCHENCK. As it is now, they are all assistant adjutant generals. If they cannot all have the same titles as adjutants, why should all have the title of adjutant generals?

Mr. BLAINE. The moment you change that you have gone to sea on the subject.

Yesterday my friend from Ohio spoke about the officers who remained in the staff departments of the Army in this city doing the duty that clerks could have performed as well; yet he speaks this morning of some who were compelled to stay here. I know that some of these officers have been compelled to stay here in Washington against their will although they again and again applied for field service. They were refused because they were wanted in the Adjutant General's office in Washington.

One word more. This bill provides for one lieutenant general, five major generals, and ten brigadier generals, sixteen general officers who are entitled to assistant adjutant generals. In the War Department you have only twenty in all. There is never a time you do not have six or eight in the War Department. Take six out of twenty and you do not leave an assistant adjutant general for each general you authorize. Instead of being reduced it ought to be increased. If I did not have the highest respect for my friend from Ohio I would say that the proposition was preposterous to have the number reduced.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, let me say a word first in regard to the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio on the word "number" in this section which I propose to strike out and which he thinks it would be improper to strike out. It appears to me that when you put into this law a provision that the Adjutant General's department should consist of a certain number of officers, and when in a subsequent part of the section you put in a provision such as is contained in this section, you thereby give clear intimation of your intention to vacate existing offices and to provide for new appointments. It was for that reason I could not consent to the insertion of the word "number." I think that the force of that objection still remains.

I desire to say a few words on what the Quartermaster General calls the "awkward titles," and which are proposed to be abolished. It has been the settled practice of the Military Department of the Government for a long time to have what are styled assistants in the several bureaus of that Department. We have in the War Department, I think, an assistant in every bureau of that Department. Commencing with the Secretary of War himself, we have an Assistant Secretary of War, we have assistant adjutant generals, we have assistant quartermaster generals, an assistant paymaster general, an assistant surgeon general, an assistant judge advocate general, an assistant provost marshal general.

If the objection of the "awkward titles" is good to those titles in the Adjutant General's staff, I ask the gentleman from Ohio why he does not propose to abolish all those titles in the other bureaus of the War Department. Why does he retain an officer with the title of assistant commissary general, or with the title of assistant paymaster general, or assistant surgeon general, or assistant judge advocate general, or assistant provost marshal general? Why is the verbal reform he is so anxious to inaugurate in this bill not applied to all of the bureaus of the War Department? Why does he restrict it to the Adjutant General's department, or the Quartermaster General's department?

If this is an inconvenient title, sir, it has endured for a long time without the discovery of the inconvenience, for these titles have been employed in the War Department since 1838, when these offices were created. They are titles which have been found to be of great convenience in the dispatch of business, not only in the various bureaus of the War Department but in all branches of the civil service also. There is no Department of the civil government, I believe, which has not those assistants also. We have an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, an Assistant Secretary of State, an Assistant Attorney General, &c.

Now, why select two bureaus of the War Department as proper subjects for this reform in nomenclature, and leave all the others untouched in this respect?

Sir, I see no inconvenience arising from these titles. On the contrary I see great confusion and injustice arising from what is called the proposed verbal reform. I am aware that the gentleman had for this the authority of a suggestion made by the Quartermaster General in a letter dated December 18, 1865, which he addressed to the Lieutenant General, and which is now before me. I have good reason to believe that the Lieutenant General does not approve of these proposed alterations.

The Quartermaster General in that letter made this suggestion, of giving up, as he expressed it, the awkward titles of assistant and deputy quartermaster general, "which are relics," as he says, "of the days when the corps was a civil, and not a military body, attached to rather than forming a constituent part of the Army."

Now, sir, I may be mistaken, but I have a strong impression that in making that assertion the Quartermaster General fell into a very grave error. I believe it is an undoubted fact that the Quartermaster General's department has always been an integral part of the Army of the United States. There never was a day—and if I am wrong, I ask the chairman of the Military Committee to correct me—when it was a civil department of the public service.

The first Quartermaster General of the United States was General Mifflin of my own State, during the revolutionary war; and he was a brigadier general in the service. So also General Pickens and General Greene, both of whom subsequently filled this office, were not only men of military rank, but men of the highest military character and ability, and they both had the rank of brigadier general.

The quartermaster's department has always been treated in the public laws and recognized by Congress as an integral part of the Army, and never as a department of the civil service attached to the Army. Therefore the reason which was suggested by the Quartermaster General for this change, it seems to me, was totally unfounded in fact.

Now, sir, this change was recommended by the Quartermaster General in regard to his own bureau. He did not of course undertake to recommend its application to bureaus with which he had no official connection. He recommended it for his own department as an alteration to be made there, and in the draft of a bill, or a project for a bill which is annexed to his letter, he put in a proviso that no officer of the department should be discharged from the service in the execution of the law. It was very proper to do that, but it was, I am obliged to say, a totally inadequate remedy or compensation for the unavoidable mischief and injustice resulting from the abolition of these offices or titles; because under that proviso, as it was recommended by the Quartermaster General, these officers, although they might have obtained new commissions, would all have lost many years of rank in the service. This would necessarily result from the necessity of their being recommissioned.

The rank which they had earned by long years of service would have been taken away from them. This, of course, was not intended by the Quartermaster General in the suggestion which he made. I have said that the Quartermaster General's department has always been recognized and treated as a constituent part of the Army. Let me advert briefly to the legislative history of this department. The department underwent various alterations after the Revolution, until the war with England, in 1812, when it was increased and reorganized by placing General Swartwout at the head of it as chief of the department, with the rank of brigadier general, four quartermaster generals with the rank of colonel, (increased in 1814 to seven,) twelve deputy quartermaster generals, and thirty assistant deputy quartermaster generals. I refer to the Army Register, dated January 1, 1815.

At the reduction of the Army in May, 1815, the quartermaster's department was greatly reduced; yet General Swartwout was retained with the rank of brigadier general; this rank he retained until May, 1816, when the department was reorganized by having two Quartermaster Generals with the rank of colonel at the head of it. This organization continued until the 8th of May, 1818, when it was again reorganized with a brigadier general at its head, and it was established as a bureau at Washington. It has continued with a brigadier general at its head ever since. Occasionally the number of its officers was increased, until July, 1838, when it was fully reorganized, restoring the grades which had formerly existed, with a slight alteration; the colonels being styled assistant quartermaster generals, (not quartermaster generals, as in previous laws,) and the deputy quartermaster generals with the rank of lieutenant colonel, (a rank still,) which had existed by act of March 8, 1799. It has continued as established in 1838, through two wars and many years of peace, without any inconvenience and without the titles being considered "awkward."

During all this time the officers of the quartermaster's department have been borne on the Army Register as a constituent part of the Army, as officers of the general staff.

I have made these observations in order to demonstrate that the department has always been regarded and treated as a military department, and not as a civil department attached to the Army.

The remarks which I have made in reference to the Quartermaster General's department have been prompted by the effort which has been made to uphold the proposed changes in the Adjutant General's department, by a reference to the suggestion which was made by the Quartermaster General for alteration in the titles of officers in that department. I hope the changes proposed in the thirteenth section relative to the Adjutant General's department will not be made, but that the House will adopt the substitute which I have offered.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg to make a remark in connection with the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think he is entirely in error in striking out the term "assistant" in connection with "adjutant" in this department, and I wish to assign one reason which has not to my knowledge been adverted to on this floor. The assistant adjutant generals are directly connected with the military department at Washington. For instance, General Seth Williams was assistant adjutant general in the army of the Potomac, representing the Adjutant General's department at Washington, under Burnside and Meade and every other general who had command in that department. His relations with the generals in command were not those of a staff officer; his relations were with the Department here, and although he issued the orders of the generals in command, those orders belonged to the Department at Washington. He had custody of the records, and even an order issued by the general in command of the department could not control these records. They belong here, and the duty of the assistant adjutant general is to see that they are presented here as part of the records to be kept at Washington.

Now, I wish to say in connection with this question, that from every military department during the war we have accumulated, through the assistant adjutant generals, all the records pertaining to this war, and that there are in this city a number of buildings filled and stored with these records which are of invaluable service both to the troops and officers of the Army and to the history of the country, by reason of the fact that these assistant adjutant generals are under the direct control of the Department at Washington.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on the floor I may perhaps be permitted to allude to another matter. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has, I doubt not without intending any unkindness, not only reflected upon the general efficiency of these departments in Washington, but he has declared here that to a great extent positions in them are retained by certain persons as a matter of favoritism as "soft places."

Mr. SCHENCK. I will ask my friend to point to one single phrase or sentence of that kind in anything I may have said. I have said nothing, whatever I may think of anybody in any department, making a reflection upon any department.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand the gentleman to refer to special persons.

Mr. SCHENCK. Nor to any department.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg pardon if I have misunderstood the gentleman. If I have not misunderstood him, I think he will make the admission. I did understand the honorable gentleman to say here upon this floor, yesterday, that these men in the departments were assigned to "soft" and "easy" places, and that they had shirked the responsibilities of the war.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never used any such language; but now, as the gentleman presses it on me, I will say that as to the greater number of those employed here, while many of them, I believe, would have preferred to have been on active service in the field, but were compelled to stay here by the importance of their services, I do believe that others were here because they preferred to remain here. But, sir, I said nothing of that kind before. I say now that I believe there are officers in some of these departments who preferred to have these places to being in the field. I hope I am now understood. But I made no general charge of that kind, nor do I now.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not intend to go behind the walls of the department for the purpose of passing judgment upon every individual who is within them.

Mr. SCHENCK. Nor do I.

Mr. DAVIS. I do say, however, that the officers connected with the departments at Washington have performed services as valuable to the Government as those who have been in the field.

Mr. SCHENCK. And I have said nothing less of them.

Mr. DAVIS. But the gentleman says that there are individuals in the departments who have been willing to shirk the dangers of the field.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not use that term at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I know, sir, that there are officers who went into the Veteran Reserve corps when they might have gone to the front, men whose wounds had been healed.

I know officers in the Army who look with distrust upon many persons who entered the Veteran Reserve corps. I know one gallant officer from my own district who, with a wound of an inch and a half in diameter through his body, with a seton in the wound and entirely through his body, went with Sherman's army day and night from Tennessee to Atlanta, and from Atlanta to the coast, fighting on the mountains above the clouds, and never went to the hospital on account of his wound except when he was in camp. But there are many men in the Veteran Reserve corps who entered it for the easy places in it.

Now, if there are some individuals in these bureaus who have been willing themselves to avoid danger, I can only say that it is in accordance with the weakness of human nature. But the men of this department have worked day and night, for I have seen them at their desks day after day and night after night, until physical nature was almost exhausted. And in some instances I have implored them to go away upon the furlough which the Secretary of War was willing to grant them. But no, they remained faithfully at their duties, although they were pressing entreated to be relieved from duty here and allowed to go to the field.

In looking over the lists of officers in the department, I find that of the assistant quartermaster generals now on service here, a large proportion of them have seen service in the field, and some of them have been wounded and disabled in the service. And you will not find in any department more faithful, efficient, and hard-working officers than the Adjutant General himself, or than his assistants, Hardee, Breck, Vincent, and others. I know personally many of the men in this department; and I do not know one of them who has not rendered efficient and faithful service in the field.

I trust, therefore, that we shall not, by the legislation we adopt here, do any injustice to these men. But I hope we shall be allowed to have the Army bill which was commended to us by the General-in-Chief, and by all our prominent generals.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] has said nothing about my amendment, I ask that it may be again read in order that the House may know upon what we are acting.

The amendment was read.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order to remove all possible objection, I will move to further amend the section by striking out the words "after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section;" so that it shall read, "but as vacancies shall occur in the grade of major," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. THAYER, by way of a substitute for the entire section as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the vote is taken upon striking out the section as amended, I must beg the indulgence of the House, as I seem to be left alone to attend to this matter on behalf of the Military Committee, to say a few words by way of comment upon what has been said by gentlemen who have addressed this House, so far as their remarks are pertinent to this section. By the amendments which I have offered, and which have been adopted by the House, this whole matter is now reduced to a simple question of taste and propriety in regard to the titles of these officers, except that the amendment now pending proposes to increase the number of officers as well as to fix their titles.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not propose to increase the number of officers, but merely to increase the rank of some three of the majors.

Mr. SCHENCK. He proposes to provide for certain officers in the department who have acquitted themselves well. Now, upon that point I have simply this remark to make: in legislating upon this subject I have tried to legislate in regard to things and not in regard to persons. One officer who has been referred to here, and who has been named, and therefore there will be no impropriety in my repeating his name—Colonel Vincent—now brigadier general by brevet, of it may be major general, for these officers go up so rapidly that I lose sight of their titles—he is an officer of whom nothing can be said in praise by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to which I will not accede. Yet, no matter who or what one of these individuals may be, what I claim is that if I do not think it necessary to have two or three more colonels, and two or three or four more lieutenant colonels, I will not consent to make them a permanent part of the Army organization with a view to any particular purpose.

I hold that there is a propriety in deciding in the first place upon what your Army system requires, doing it without reference to persons, leaving persons to get the advantage of it or not afterward. Now, if the gentleman thinks, as I presume he does, that there ought to be a greater number of colonels and lieutenant colonels generally, without reference to the particular persons who may first fill these places, that is another question.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say, in the first place, that the gentleman has, by a figure of speech—literally a figure of speech—increased the effect of my amendment. It provides for only two more colonels and one more lieutenant colonel, making three officers in all. If the gentleman had given attention to what I attempted to say yesterday, he would remember that I distinctly took the ground that the Adjutant General's corps had not, according to the bill reported by the gentleman, as many officers of rank in proportion to other staff corps as it ought to have. My concern is not with regard to the effect of the bill on individuals; what I desire is the equalization of rank between the different staff corps, not discriminating against the corps which ought to be above the others. I say that, instead of discriminating against the Adjutant General's corps, our legislation should be in favor of that corps.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman, Mr. Speaker; and I repeat, there has been, in all these departments, a gradual, but though gradual, pretty rapid, creeping up in everything that relates to rank. Five years ago, when this war began, we had an Adjutant General, who, however, ranked only as a colonel. We now make him a brigadier general. At that time, one assistant adjutant general, ranking as a lieutenant colonel, was deemed sufficient. Now, there are two assistant adjutant generals in that bureau, both ranking as colonels. Then the Adjutant General's Bureau was satisfied with four majors and nine captains. We now propose to give its bureau thirteen majors and no captains. Everybody in that department is to be raised above the rank of captain. Thus it is continually with these bureaus. Step by step, from point to point, throughout our whole legislation for many years past, particularly since the war commenced, there has been a gradual advancement in number, titles, rank, and compensation.

Now, we propose to have for this increased regular Army as many of these officers as may be necessary. We assent to an advancement in numbers and rank. But the gentleman says this is not sufficient. While one colonel at the head of the Adjutant General's Bureau was formerly sufficient, we must now have not only one brigadier general, but four colonels. While formerly one lieutenant colonel served as an assistant, we must now have five lieutenant colonels as assistants. Besides, all the captains must be raised to majors, and the number of majors must be increased to thirteen.

But, sir, enough upon that point. I believe that this section makes ample provision for that department with regard both to the number and the rank of the officers; and however much I might be willing to gratify particular individuals or officers, I am not willing to ingraft upon the Army what I deem an unnecessary addition with respect to rank or numbers. Therefore I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

Now, as to this question of title, the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. THAYER] was compelled in looking at the bill to shut one eye in order to sustain himself in his argument. "Why," asked he, "do you not have assistant adjutant generals? Why wipe them out entirely?" If the gentleman will read the bill, he will find that we provide for an Adjutant General, and for two assistant adjutant generals, with the rank of colonel, while all those who rank as lieutenant colonel or as major are to be called simply adjutants. So the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark by way of correction?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. The remark which I made was in reference to the abolition of the title of assistant quartermaster general.

Mr. SCHENCK. We are not discussing that now.

Mr. THAYER. I asked why the committee proposed to abolish the title of assistant quartermaster general, while they leave the assistants in all the other bureaus.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not mistaken when I say the gentleman has singled out these two departments—

Mr. THAYER. If there was any inadvertence about it, I wish to say now I meant that the gentleman has abolished these titles in the Adjutant General's department and the quartermaster's department, while he has left the titles in all of the other bureaus.

Mr. SCHENCK. We thought there should be one or more assistants in each department. The Quartermaster General was satisfied as it was arranged in his department, and so we have left it. We have provided for an Adjutant General, and two assistants to take his place; the rest we call adjutants. My friend from Maine agrees with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that is unprecedented and all wrong, because if you have adjutants in the field it will create confusion if you call them all adjutants. If you take them now in the field they are all called assistant adjutant generals, and there would be confusion, according to the gentleman's reasoning, because of the title, for in each case he would be an assistant adjutant general.

He says he must be called assistant adjutant general because he reports to the general head at Washington. Apply that to the other department. You have assistant quartermaster general and assistant quartermasters. There is a general head at Washington to report to. The same reasoning would make assistant quartermasters and assistant quartermaster generals in every case.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says it is like the civil Departments, where you have a Secretary and an Assistant Secretary. I admit that, but you do not call all the clerks Assistant Secretaries. You have a Secretary, one or two Assistant Secretaries, and the rest of the subordinates you call clerks. So his illustration is a bad one indeed.

You are not to interfere with titles. Congress has interfered with titles again and again. There was a time, and if necessary I can refer to the statute, when we had a deputy adjutant general. That portion of the old cumbersome system was stricken off. Gentlemen will find it in the act of 1798. There was a time when you had not only a deputy quartermaster general but an assistant deputy quartermaster general. And when one was called to act in his place because of sickness or disability he had to sign himself A. A. D. Q. M. G., Acting Assistant Deputy Quartermaster General. Without those letters he could not indicate his title.

I believe differently from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] I believe that the Quartermaster General showed his sense when he said it was time to get rid of these long, improper titles, and to call quartermasters quartermasters, and not assistant quartermasters. I believe the same thing in regard to the others, that instead of assistant adjutant general it is better to have an Adjutant General's department, and to have at the head of it an Adjutant General, with two or three assistant adjutant generals.

I think the gentleman is mistaken in regard to the title of deputy, as he will find if he goes back far enough. Deputy is not a military word. It has no military identity. It is making a civic title of deputy into a military title. We have got rid of all that, or propose to get rid of it.

Mr. THAYER. I could not go back further than General Mifflin, who first filled this position.

Mr. SCHENCK. What time?

Mr. THAYER. I will tell the gentleman by referring to the paper.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is suggested that the gentleman may go back to 1492. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. No, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to settle the question after he has consulted his authorities.

Mr. THAYER. It was May, 1776. He was Quartermaster General of the Army with the rank of general.

Mr. SCHENCK. By the amendments I have made this morning—and before the question is taken I will ask to have it read as amended—we have removed objections thought to be so serious to the bill, and if the House does not want to give higher rank to these officers it will let the section stand as it is.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to know if I understand what this dispute is about. If I understand it, it is reduced to this, whether you shall say John Jack, or simply Jack—whether you shall say "assistant adjutant" or simply "adjutant." If there is any confusion in a name, one is just about the same as the other in that respect.

Now as regards surplus titles, the German barons, having some nine or ten titles, would not like to part with any of them. I do not see why "adjutant general" is not as good as "deputy adjutant," or "assistant adjutant," especially when, if the amendment of the chairman of the committee is adopted, it is to make no difference in their rank or pay.

But I wish to say that if I understand it, the amendment of my colleague [Mr. THAYER] makes an increase in the pay of three officers. Instead of having thirteen with the rank and emoluments of major, he proposes ten, and to put the others into a higher rank. Now I do not know precisely what that is for. I do not know why it is necessary to increase the pay of those three instead of having it as it is in the bill—thirteen adjutants with the pay and emoluments of major. I have not heard any good reason yet. Are there not enough colonels who are willing to be appointed adjutants now? Why, therefore, increase the pay to this amount?

Then I cannot see any good reason why you shall not diminish the expense of the Army when you can do it without legislating anybody out of office. When they die, the number is to be reduced to ten.

A single word more. The whole question between my colleague [Mr. THAYER] and the committee amounts to this: a curtailment of the word "assistant," and making it read simply "adjutant," with an increase of the pay of three, and a prevention of the diminution of the expense when they go out of office by death or resignation (they are not legislated out) by three. That is the whole question. It is hardly worth quarreling about, but if you adopt the amendment of my colleague you largely increase the expense and prevent a reduction of the number of these officers.

Mr. THAYER. I will not detain the House but a moment. I wish to make an explanation in order that the House may act with full knowledge of the present position of the question. The substitute which I offered makes no increase and no alteration in the present number or rank of the officers in that department.

Mr. STEVENS. It was a misapprehension on my part.

Mr. THAYER. No, sir, the gentleman is correct, but at the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] I accepted his modification, which gave increased rank to two who are already assistant adjutant generals. It was not my understanding at the time the proposition was made by that gentleman that it would necessarily increase the pay. If I had known that I would not have accepted the modification. If, therefore, the House wishes to retain the present organization precisely as it is, with no alterations, all they have to do is to strike out the section and disagree to the amendment as modified by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] and I will offer the section of the Senate bill, which will keep the department precisely as it is, with no increase at all.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first on the substitute proposed by Mr. THAYER.

Mr. UPSON. I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. A motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 35, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 89, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Chandler, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbard, Kelley, Latham, M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Latham, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McNair, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Shanklin, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Townbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elhu B. Washburne, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Banks, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Deming, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Julian, Kelso, Kuykendall, Marston, McClure, Mercer, Miller, Orth, Paine, Price, Ritter, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Stevens, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Wentworth—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bidwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Neell, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Van Aornam, Robert T. Van Horn, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—75.

So Mr. THAYER's substitute was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to add a proviso to the section.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the previous question, the effect of which is that the House passes from the consideration of this section to the next.

Mr. STEVENS. Is there not another vote to be taken in reference to this question?

The SPEAKER. Not unless a reconsideration be moved of the vote by which the previous question was seconded. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] can be offered only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAINE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Cannot we have an opportunity of voting down the whole section?

The SPEAKER. If it were not for the previous question, a motion might be made to add to the section. As it is, the House has passed from its consideration.

The fourteenth section of the bill was then read, as follows:

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That there shall be four inspectors general of the Army, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; and four assistant inspectors general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, one of whom shall be specially assigned to duty as inspector of cavalry; and two assistant inspectors general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to explain that section. I will preface what I have to say, however, by the remark that I presume that if in any way it differs from what is desired by those heads of bureaus at the other end of the avenue, they will be listened to rather than the Committee on Military Affairs. I say this because I wish to have the House and the country know just what the House has been doing.

The committee proposed in one of these bureaus to retain every officer, and give them more rank than they ever had before this war. The House was dissatisfied with that, and they have insisted upon increasing the rank of three of the majors out of the thirteen of the Adjutant General's department, so as to make two of them colonels and one lieutenant colonel.

And thus they declare that the committee is wrong, and that these gentlemen who used their influence in the other end of the Capitol are right; and that the rank which they had when we had a million men in the field was not high enough when we came to provide for a smaller army, but that they should now have attained that rank. There is no reason excepting that; that is just what they had done.

I thought that possibly, now the war is over, we might be able to reduce matters a little for a smaller army, below what we had during the war with myriads of men in the field. But I was so far mistaken in that expectation as to find that we can not only not do so much as that, but that even higher rank is to be conferred upon those officers with the smaller army. I am determined that this shall be understood. I am determined that it shall be known by the House and by the country how far any attempt at reform is sustained here by this House.

Now, I knew when I began that we should have difficulty in touching these bureaus. I knew perfectly well, as I said yesterday, that all the tendency of the legislation time out of mind had been to build up these bureaus here at Washington, and that we should find great difficulty in getting back to a sounder and more wholesome and a living condition of things. I knew that the personal, official, and social influences which surround this House would make it very difficult for any committee of this House to carry any measure of reform, to remove any abuse, to cut off any incumbrance, to change anything which existed in the old condition of things, or to prevent a still further advance in the direction of higher rank, more officers, and greater pay. But the realization has gone far beyond my anticipations.

Still I mean to struggle on, and to sustain what the committee have decided upon whether I am sustained by the House or not, or even by those of the committee who voted with me in the committee. I intend to struggle on and do what I can in the way of reform. And I shall do so upon the principle I announced a few moments ago, when speaking upon one of these amendments, that he is a better friend of the Army as well as the country who is willing to make wholesome corrections, to remove abuses, and cut off incumbrances than he who prefers to accept all that has grown up, independent of any disposition he may have to pile more on.

I think these remarks necessary as a sort of preface to the course which I shall pursue as we advance from point to point in considering these different bureaus.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] a question in this connection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman's object is to reduce the officer force of the Army, why has he proposed companies to consist of fifty instead of a hundred privates, thus giving double the proportion of officers we have heretofore had in the Army?

Mr. SCHENCK. That has nothing to do with the question under consideration. But I will say that in every organization of the Army, looking to an expansion in time of necessity, it is usual, and it has always been our system of legislation to have a system of officers by which in an emergency the number of privates can be increased to the necessity of the occasion.

But we are considering now the organization of the staff departments, the bureaus which have their several heads at Washington, and which have their staff officers permeating the country, and extending to the different portions of the Army.

The section under consideration was framed with a view to accommodate what was ascertained to be wanted by the military authorities, so far as the committee could understand, and as they believed. One amendment was made by the committee. Originally the committee reported only three inspectors general; it was afterward suggested and urged that there ought to be kept up a Cavalry Bureau; and a solution of that difficulty was made in the way here reported. Instead of having the Cavalry Bureau as now a distinct organization in the Army, no more needed, perhaps, than an artillery bureau or an infantry bureau, it is proposed that one of these inspectors shall be assigned to duty as an inspector of cavalry.

In this way you may be able to detail all the efficient officers of the present Cavalry Bureau, without the need of maintaining a distinct bureau.

Mr. DAVIS. I see that the fourteenth section provides for—

Four assistant inspectors general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, one of whom shall be specially assigned to duty as inspector of cavalry.

I desire to understand the reason for the insertion of this last clause.

Mr. SCHENCK. That provision was adopted on consultation with those who ought to know more than the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] or myself in reference to this matter. This bill proposes to increase greatly the cavalry branch of our Army. We are to have double as much cavalry as we have ever had before. During the war, a Cavalry Bureau was established, and it has been continued up to the present time. By common consent all round, it has been considered that, instead of continuing the Cavalry Bureau, the object could be effected just as well by authorizing the assignment of one of the assistant inspectors general to that particular service.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not that conflict with another provision of this bill which says that transfers shall be made from any arm of the service to any other arm of the service?

Mr. SCHENCK. It does not in the slightest degree. We provide for the appointment of four inspectors, one of whom may be detailed, not appointed, as inspector of cavalry. One officer may be detailed at one time; another at another; but it is probable that when one had been assigned to that particular duty he would be kept upon that assignment, because of the experience which he would have acquired.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to inquire further, whether, without any such provision in this bill, the Secretary of War would not have entire authority at all times to assign any one of these inspectors to that service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think it probable he would. Yet it has been deemed proper by some of the most eminent officers of the Army, whom I could name if it were necessary, that there should be in this bill a provision of this sort.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to repel the imputation which I consider as being implied in the language of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I leave the House and the country to judge of the good taste exhibited by that gentleman in the scolding which he has given this House for daring to differ with him upon a measure reported from his committee and under consideration by the House.

He has spoken of influences of bureaus and of personal influences. Sir, I discharge my duty here under a conscientious sense of the obligation which I owe to the country and to my constituents, and with the best light which my intellect enables me to cast upon that conscientious discharge of duty. I am not the agent of any bureau or of any Department. I am quite as independent, politically and personally, of every bureau and every Department of this Government, in my votes and in my action in this House, as is the chairman of the Military Committee; and if he shall discharge his duty here, in bringing in his bills from this committee, with the same absence of personal motive and the same disregard of personal aims with which I discharge mine in the consideration of them, he will satisfy, I take leave to say, the utmost expectations of his constituents and of the country.

Mr. SCHENCK. When I said that there are social and personal and official influences around us here whenever we come to legislate upon these subjects, I meant just what I said.

Mr. THAYER. The remark gains no weight by repetition.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am subjected to those influences; so are others. The difference, if there be any, is this: when I dine with, or am visited by, or visit in turn, one of these gentlemen, whom I esteem my friends, I am very much inclined to do what he wants done, to keep him where he is and to help him along, and I would be glad if I could do it. But I have taught myself to believe that I must struggle against this disposition; and I have succeeded in doing violence to my own feelings, and have not yielded, altogether at any rate, to the personal, social, and moral influences in this respect which surround me among the many very agreeable acquaintances that I have among these officers in the bureaus.

I do not know whether anybody is weaker than I am or not. If they are, then perhaps there may be a difference between us. If not, then there is none.

I have not charged anything else on the gentleman from Pennsylvania particularly in any way, but I have said and announced to the country I did hope this Congress would, now the war is over and when we are going to have a comparatively small military establishment, so much less than we have had during the war, attempt to bring down, or at least not increase, the relative or absolute rank of the various officers of the Army. In that I am disappointed. It may be I ought not to have been disappointed, but I am. That is all I can make of it.

I recognize the right of gentlemen to represent their own constituency and vote as they please. I have been accustomed to vote as I pleased, but always within the bounds of propriety. And I mean on these subjects to say what I please to the country.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not think it is a killing affair even if the gentleman has been disappointed by the majority of the House having acted on their own good sense, his opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to rest under the imputation cast upon me by my friend from Ohio. I wish to say no drop of blood kindred to my own circulates in the veins of any officer of the Army to be affected in any way by this bill.

I wish to say I am not under any social influence. Since I have lived in Washington I have never, like my honorable friend from Ohio, had the privilege of being entertained by distinguished characters at dinner. I am under no influence of that kind, but I respect the opinion of men high in the military service. When I know there was pending a bill which had been submitted by Lieutenant General Grant, General Meade, General Burnside, and other distinguished generals; and when I thought that bill had been concocted under their supervision. I say it is not only entitled to my consideration, but to the consideration of every member of the House. There is no one who supposes these distinguished generals of the Army know nothing of military affairs, or at least do not know as much as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. I only honor the men whom the country honor, and in whom I am sure the country has confidence.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman from New York yields to me to make the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SMITH. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I withdraw the motion.

SATURDAY SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, by unanimous consent, that to-morrow be devoted to debate on the President's message.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Saturday bills on leave and resolutions for reference only may be received by unanimous consent on condition they shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say only a word in conclusion. While I represent a constituency on this floor I intend to give my votes independent of any considerations like those to which the honorable chairman of the committee has alluded. I shall be under the influence and control of no man or set of men. I shall carry out the convictions of my own judgment, regardless of what may be said on one side or the other.

But, sir, in the discussion of this bill I think we should be guided by the suggestions of provisions which have been made by men of high military position. I go further. We ought rather to take their opinion than the opinion of so distinguished a military gentleman as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. There was no such suggestion made as the gentleman suggests. I profess to be no more virtuous than my neighbors, but if it gives satisfaction to my friend I most solemnly assure him I had no thought of anything he had said or done.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one judge advocate general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; and one assistant judge advocate general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the said judge advocate general shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and shall perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. And of the judge advocates now in office there shall be retained a number not exceeding ten, to be selected by the Secretary of War, who shall perform their duties under the direction of the Judge Advocate General until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may," after the word "there;" so that it will read:

And of the judge advocates now in office there may be retained a number not exceeding ten, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I also move to add at the end of the section the words "or until the Secretary of War decides that their service may be dispensed with;" so that the clause will read:

And of the judge advocates now in office there may be retained a number not exceeding ten, to be selected by the Secretary of War, who shall perform their duties under the direction of the Judge Advocate General until otherwise provided by law, or until the Secretary of War decides that their service may be dispensed with.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to insert after the words "military commissions" the words "authorized by law;" so that it shall read, "military commissions authorized by law."

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope that will not be adopted, unless the House intends to cast censure upon the action of the Administration of the late lamented President Lincoln. If the gentleman means by the term "authorized by law," authorized by special statute of the United States, it is very well known that all the commissions that were held under the late Administration were never authorized by special enactment. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to consider that if the authority arises by the general usage and law of nations in time of war, the words are wholly unnecessary. Every one knows that there has never been a military commission convened in the United States for the trial of anybody that has not been expressly authorized by statute, save in the time of war. That being the case, why introduce such a provision here? We are not secure either against rebellion or invasion; and does the gentleman suppose that by inserting a word here to place a limitation upon the executive power of the Government in the event of foreign invasion, so that offenses committed in time of public war, in violation of the usage and laws of war, shall not be punished in the absence of express authority of congressional enactment? If he does not, I hope he will withdraw his amendment. It is time enough to consider such a proposition when the Government in time of peace shall attempt to try anybody by a military commission without authority of statute. It has never been done yet, and it is time enough to provide against any such abuse when it is attempted to be done. Why undertake to put this in a statute in view of a contingency that may arise at any hour entirely beyond our control, and when Congress is not in session?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to take up the time except to say a word or two. The only point in dispute between the gentleman [Mr. BINGHAM] and myself is in reference to "military commissions." The other two courts, "courts-martial" and "courts of inquiry," are not in question. They are definitely authorized by the laws of Congress, and have been since the organization of this Government. But the words "military commissions" are not used in the statutes of Congress, except in one, I believe, in reference to the punishment of guerrillas.

Mr. BINGHAM. Excuse me; the gentleman is entirely mistaken. The words are used in three or four statutes. I remember one adopted by the last Congress subjecting spies to punishment by death upon conviction before a military commission.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was the same law, and related to spies and guerrillas.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I introduced the bill myself in the last Congress. The gentleman is mistaken. I know there are military commissioners sometimes appointed to look into contracts and claims. We have commissions appointed in regard to the administration of affairs in the Army; but I speak of tribunals for the trial of persons charged with offenses against the Government in time of war, but who are not themselves in the Army.

Mr. BINGHAM. There were proceedings authorized to try parties by military commission for fraudulent devices to the injury of the Government, and providing for the infliction of penalties.

Mr. GARFIELD. It makes no difference. I concede that the words have been used in the statute once.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, half a dozen times.

Mr. GARFIELD. Never mind; the question does not turn on the number of times the expression has been used. What I said was agreeing with gentlemen in this: that military commissions apply to the Army in time of war and in reference to crimes over which the Army has control.

Now, we are building up a military establishment for a time of peace; and I do not believe it best to introduce that expression in a bill to establish an army on a peace basis, and let it be understood that military commissions are by a sort of inference to be used in this Government without express statute. And if gentlemen desire the expression retained in the law I want the qualifying words to go with it, or else I desire that the words "military commissions" shall be stricken out. I am satisfied, however, with either.

Mr. UPSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "law" and inserting in lieu thereof "the laws of war."

Mr. HALP. I suggest to the gentleman that he add the words "in time of peace."

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. UPSON. That is a very good suggestion coming from that source.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not accept that amendment.

Mr. UPSON. Well, I offer my amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. If this section had any words of limitation in it to the effect suggested by my honorable colleague, that it should not be operative or binding upon the executive department of this Government in time of war or public invasion or rebellion, I would not take any exception at all to his motion, but the gentleman greatly mistakes the scope and effect of this legislation if he supposes that it is not to operate in the presence of a public enemy as well as in times of peace, and I would count myself false to the duty which I owe to the people of this country if I could sit silently by while an attempt is made here by solemn act of legislation to place a fetter upon the arm of the Executive, who is charged by his oath of office to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and to summon to the defense of the country its whole military power, either to suppress rebellion or to repel invasion.

I say to my colleague that according to all the authorities the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] is sustained, that it is this day the common written declared judgment of the civilized world, that without formal legislation in time of public war all violations of the law in aid of the public enemy may by the usages and customs of war be subjected to trial by the tribunals of military justice known as military commissions.

I trust the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] will be adopted by the House.

Mr. UPSON. I demand the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to say a word?

Mr. UPSON. I will withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is with diffidence that I assume to be a peace-maker even between these friends of mine. I dare say I shall have somebody finding treason in what I say. I suppose that the gentlemen know that military commissions are tribunals known under the laws of war in time of war and in an enemy's country, and I suppose they will agree that the records of them had better be kept somewhere. Why not use, then, instead of the words "military commissions authorized by the laws of war," the words "military commissions authorized in time of war."

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to accept that modification of my amendment.

Mr. UPSON. I do not think that meets the case, and I cannot accept that amendment. I demand the previous question on the pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, the question being first upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. UPSON.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 23, noes 46; no quorum voting.

Mr. UPSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and UPSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 51.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, as modified; and upon a division, there were—ayes 36, noes 57.

The SPEAKER stated the result of the vote, and announced that the amendment had been disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. The Chair distinctly announced that the amendment had been rejected before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] called for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The attention of the gentleman from Ohio was held by a member conversing with him at the time the Chair announced the result of the vote.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That certainly was not the fault of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the demand for tellers was made in time by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to another point of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall that it is almost impossible for members to hear what the Speaker says, what is read by the Clerk, or what is said by members on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair generally speaks distinctly and loudly enough to be heard by all who give their attention to what he says.

Mr. SMITH. I am informed by gentlemen on my left that they do not understand the amendment, and I would ask that it be read again.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose it can be reported again by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, it will be read again.

No objection being made, the amendment was again read.

The question was upon the call of Mr. GARFIELD for tellers upon agreeing to his amendment.

The call for tellers was not agreed to.

The amendment was not agreed to, as above stated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move to amend the section by striking out the words "and military commissions."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman what he proposes to do with the records of military commissions, of which there have been several held.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no desire to detain the House upon this subject, but as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has asked me a question, I desire to say that if gentlemen are willing, now that the war is over, to retain these military commissions, I think they should say so. Their functions have ceased, and I am not willing that these organizations without any authority of law shall be continued in time of peace. I do not discuss the propriety of these tribunals in the past, or the propriety of trying any traitor of the late war. We are now legislating for the future, which will, I trust, for the next half century at least, see us under the dominion of law. Therefore I move to strike out the words "and military commissions," and upon that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 76, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Chanler, Donnelly, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Marshall, Mercer, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Smith, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Warner, Whaley, and Windom—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elijah B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—76.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alvey, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bergen, Bidwell, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Deftrees, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Latham, William Lawrence, LeBlond, McCullough, McIndoe, Morrill, Moulton, Neill, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Winfield, and Wright—73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by striking out in the twelfth line of the fifteenth section the words "selected by the Secretary of War," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the clause will read:

And of the judge advocates now in office there shall be retained a number not exceeding ten, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall perform their duties under the direction of the Judge Advocate General until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. Speaker, I am told by gentlemen about me that these officers are already appointed, and that this is a mere provision for the retention of a portion of them, leaving the Secretary of War to decide who shall be mustered out. I do not so understand the case. I understand that the judge advocates now in office hold their positions only temporarily, and during the continuance of the volunteer organization. If any of them are to be made a part of the permanent organization of the Army under this bill, I submit that they ought to be subject to precisely the same method of appointment as other officers are—that there should not be an opening here for favoritism by a single officer, but that they should be appointed by the Executive, with the concurrence of the Senate, in precisely the same manner as other officers are.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the matter stands thus: these officers have been appointed in the manner suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE;] and the effect of this bill is simply to allow the retention of a portion of them, not exceeding ten, to be dismissed from the service just as soon as the public interest may warrant it.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to ask him this question: are these officers now appointed in the service? If this bill should not pass will they remain a part of the force of the Army? It seems to me they will not.

Mr. BINGHAM. As I understand, they may, unless they are mustered out. They are liable to be mustered out of the service like other officers in the service. But they are now in the Army, not by the terms of their commissions for a limited and specific time. They are liable to be mustered out whenever their further services are not required.

I desire to say in this connection that, according to my recollection, there are now about eighteen of these officers employed in the service. The effect of this bill will be to take eight of them out of the service at once, leaving the Secretary of War to select from the whole eighteen and retain a number not exceeding ten, if the public exigency should require that number. If, in his judgment, the public exigency does not require any of them, he will, under the provisions of this bill, muster them all out. If five are sufficient, he will retain but five. Under the amendment suggested by my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Secretary of War is required to muster all these officers out so soon as their services can be dispensed with.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman one other question: whether these officers are not now in the service precisely as additional paymasters, and assistant adjutants general, and assistant quartermasters of volunteers are now in the service, and whether, in order to be retained in the service, they do not require reappointment just as much as the officers I have named require reappointment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not so understand the scope of this bill or the effect of existing laws. I yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who can explain this matter more fully.

Mr. SCHENCK. When this bill was first framed it embraced a provision for a judge advocate general and an assistant judge advocate general only. It was, however, ascertained that the business of the Judge Advocate General's office has in fact increased during the last year, notwithstanding the termination of hostilities, in consequence of the vast mass of records to be examined and filed and reports to be made; so that it was necessary to have more assistance. The effect of the section, as it originally stood, would probably have been to legislate out of office all these judge advocates with the rank of major, because it limited the Judge Advocate General's department to the Judge Advocate General and his assistant.

With a view to obtaining information on this subject a correspondence was opened by the committee with Judge Advocate General Holt, to ascertain how many of the twenty-one judge advocates who had been appointed remained in office, and how many of them it would be desirable to retain. He explained to us that he must for some time to come have at least as many as the six now employed in the office, and that it would also be convenient and proper to retain four or five or six, to be detailed to attend to the trials that might be ordered. We fixed the number at the lowest limit consistently with what seemed to be expected and desired by that department—a little lower, indeed—and provided that ten might be retained.

There are eighteen of these officers now in office. There have been twenty-one. These eighteen are in office under a provision of the act of July 17, 1862, which I will read, and by which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] will discover that he is mistaken. That act provides in the sixth section that—"There may be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for each army in the field, a judge advocate, with the rank, pay, and emoluments, each, of a major of cavalry, who shall perform the duties of judge advocate for the army to which they respectively belong, under the direction of the Judge Advocate General."

Under that act these officers have been appointed, have been confirmed by the Senate, have by some construction been retained, and are now in office. They are borne upon the Army Register like other officers. We want to get rid of a portion of them at least.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask another question, and that is, whether the term "army in the field" has not a definite meaning? Have we any armies in the field to-day in the sense in which the term is used in that act? We had the army of the James, the army of the Tennessee, the army of the Potomac, and so on.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was always inclined to disagree with the construction, but by the construction put upon it even by the law authorities at the War Department these persons remain in office, having been appointed and confirmed, although the army may have been disbanded. They are now actually in office, eighteen of them enjoying the emoluments, drawing salary, and most of them, I believe, at work. I think, after the fullest correspondence with an explanation from the Judge Advocate General, ten may be dispensed with. I think the gentleman will find his object entirely secured by leaving the selection from those now in office.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the quartermaster's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; six quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; ten quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; forty-four quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry; and at least two thirds of all original vacancies in each of the grades of lieutenant colonel and major, and all original vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled by selection from among those persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers in the Army of the United States in the late war. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grades of major and captain in this department, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of majors shall be reduced to twelve and the number of captains to thirty, and thereafter the number of officers in each of said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have been under a promise to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on my left, for a day or two to give him the floor to have some bills printed.

CHESAPEAKE BAY AND LAKE ONTARIO.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back House bill No. 92, to ascertain the practicability of having steamboat navigation from Chesapeake bay, at the mouth of the Susquehanna river, to Lake Ontario, in the State of New York; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. SMITH moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back House bill No. 144, granting lands to the State of West Virginia to aid in the construction of certain railroads, with the recommendation that it do not pass, and moved that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Militia, reported back House bill No. 102, to educate the militia, with amendments; which were ordered to be printed and with the bill recommitted.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope not, as we ought to work another hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope we will not adjourn until we get through with the pending section of the Army bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 61.

Mr. SMITH demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, leave of absence was granted to his colleague, Mr. VAN AERENAM, for ten days, and to himself for one week from to-day.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to strike out section sixteen and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Quartermaster General's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; six assistant quartermaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; twelve deputy quartermaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; twenty quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and forty-eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry, and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

The substitute which I have offered is one which was prepared under the supervision of two distinguished generals whose names have been mentioned heretofore. And I understand that a bill containing this very provision was submitted to the gentleman who reported this bill, and that the original is now in this city with the interlineations. But whether it is so or not, I think there are many reasons why the sixteenth section, at least, as reported by the committee, should be amended.

I understand that the chairman of the committee consented to an amendment to the thirteenth section in relation to the Adjutant General's department; and I asked him if he had any amendment to propose to this section; because I inferred, from the course taken in regard to the other and the amendment which he offered thereto, that at least the same justice would be done to gentlemen in the quartermaster's department that he had conceded to those in the Adjutant General's department.

It will be observed by the provisions of this section that the nomenclature of all the assistant quartermasters in the department of a certain rank is entirely changed, so that the same effect will be produced precisely in that department, as was shown by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] as is produced in the department of the Adjutant General.

We have, for instance, under the provisions of this bill, forty-four quartermasters with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry. There are in the existing Quartermaster General's department, I think, forty-four assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captain. There is no such grade established by this bill. Therefore the legal effect, as I submit to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] of passing this section and making it a law, would be to legislate out of office every person in the Quartermaster General's department of the rank of captain who now holds a commission as assistant quartermaster with that rank. My great object is to do exact justice to the officers in that department as to those in every other department.

And I will say that the same effect will be produced upon three colonels and four lieutenant colonels who are now commissioned as assistant quartermasters general and deputy quartermasters general. The commission runs by the nomenclature established by the existing law. The rank of deputies and assistants is entirely incident to their commission. They are not commissioned as captains, majors, or colonels, but as assistant quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels, majors, or captains, as the case may be. Therefore whenever the office is abolished which now exists by name in the present law, the abolition of that office removes at once the party holding this particular commission and he is retired from the regular Army; he is legislated out of the Army and holds no commission in it.

Now, I have no disposition to take up the time of the House, but I think that the provisions of the Senate bill in that particular do full justice to all parties, and I know not what reason the honorable chairman of the committee can assign against the adoption of that proposition.

It is true that in another part of the section, at the close of it, there is this provision:

The Secretary of War may assign at any time from among the officers of the quartermaster's department an officer to serve as chief quartermaster of a geographical military division, or of a separate army in the field, consisting of not less than ten thousand men, who shall have, while so assigned and acting, the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; but not more than two officers shall hold such assigned rank at any one time, and any such officer relieved from the assigned duty shall return to his lineal rank in the department.

Mr. BLAINE. That part is not properly in the bill. It is to be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS. If that provision is intended to be stricken out, I have of course no remarks to make upon it. But I submit that the amendment which I have submitted accomplishes all and no more than should be accomplished by the bill in reference to the Quartermaster General's department.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] whether it would not satisfy him, inasmuch as this change was made at the request of the Quartermaster General, if a proviso were added to the section, that it shall not work to the vacation of any commissions; would not that be entirely satisfactory?

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to any reasonable provision that will accomplish that end.

Mr. BLAINE. The committee had no such purpose as the gentleman seems to suppose. They reported precisely what was recommended by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. DAVIS. I know that there are a number of gentlemen in the Quartermaster General's department who do not concur in the wisdom of the changes recommended by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. BLAINE. There is another point which has been made by some gentlemen, in the course of this debate, although perhaps not by the gentleman from New York, to which I desire to refer for a moment. It is that these officers would have commissions of a more recent date than those which were vacated, and that hence the measure would work an injury to them. Now, that cannot be so because their rank is entirely relative.

It is no matter when their commissions are dated, so that they hold the same relative position as respects the men who come in rivalry with them for promotion. If all the commissions are dated similarly there is no harm done to anybody.

Mr. THAYER. I will yield the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING,] who has a request to make of the House.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Speaker, a very important memorial has been presented to the Military Committee, being the application of J. B. Sperry, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, for a reduction of the military reservation at Fort Riley. There has also been referred to that committee a petition from citizens of western Kansas, asking an appropriation for the bridging of the Republican river, or for the sale of certain lands to aid in that purpose. I find, on examination, that these petitions involve nearly all the legislation that has been passed in reference to the Pacific railroad companies, and much of the legislation that is applicable to the public lands. I ask, therefore, that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of these memorials, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the motion was entertained and agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. THAYER. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says that this change of nomenclature will not in any way affect the rank or position of any of these officers. I hold that in regard to priority of commission it does produce a change. If you commission a man under this law to a new office, I do not suppose you are going to provide that he shall hold the commission which he did at a prior time when he was commissioned under another law.

Mr. BLAINE. He holds the same rank in the department.

Mr. DAVIS. Every man who has served faithfully in the Army of the United States under commission of an officer is entitled by a certain term of service to a certain increase of ration. This is known as the "longevity" ration. Now, I undertake to say that these men, if you appoint them to new offices, unless you make special provision that they shall be entitled to such longevity ration, will be deprived of that benefit.

Mr. BLAINE. The "longevity" ration only applies to the infantry branch of the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. With a view of removing the objection to this section, or rather this phase of the objection, I move to add to the section the following proviso:

But nothing in this section shall be construed so as to affect the commission of any officer now commissioned, either as acting quartermaster general, or as deputy quartermaster general, or as assistant quartermaster general, but only to change the title to quartermaster in the case of those who rank as colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, without affecting in any way their relative positions, or the time from which they take such rank.

Mr. THAYER. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] it leaves the organization of the Quartermaster General's department precisely as it is now. I would ask the gentleman from New York if that is not the effect of his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I really am unable to say.

Mr. BLAINE. Not by a very great deal. The House bill, as amended, proposes to have three colonels in the department, and his amendment six. The House bill proposes to have four lieutenant colonels, and he proposes to have twelve.

Mr. HALE. I call for the reading of the first two clauses of the substitute proposed by my colleague, so that we may see what it amounts to.

Mr. THAYER. I hope that will be done.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is in neither the House bill nor in the Senate bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not say it was.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] to point out the necessity for increasing the number of quartermasters over and above the number provided in the House bill. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] proposes a larger number.

Mr. THAYER. I am opposed to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.] I desire to preserve the organization of this department in the form in which it now exists, which I understand can be accomplished by striking out that portion of the Senate provision which provides for a new grade, three assistant chief quartermasters general.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] allow me to suggest an amendment which I desire to have offered?

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending to the section, and a substitute for the section pending.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire to read it for the information of the gentleman, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. THAYER. I will hear the amendment read.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I propose to have this section amended by striking out the word "brigadier" and inserting the word "major" before the word "general." Also to insert after the word "general" the words "three quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier generals;" also strike out the word "six" and insert the word "four" in the same line. The section would then read as follows:

That the quartermaster's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major general; three quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier generals; four quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; ten quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; forty-four quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry; and at least two thirds of all original vacancies in each of the grades of lieutenant colonel and major, and all original vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled by selection from among those persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers in the Army of the United States in the late war. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grades of major and captain in this department, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of majors shall be reduced to twelve and the number of captains to thirty, and thereafter the number of officers in each of said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers.

Mr. THAYER. I prefer some other amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THAYER. I will.

UNIFORM MILITIA SYSTEM, ETC.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to have entered upon the Journal a motion to reconsider the vote, by which the House yesterday recommitted to the Committee on the Militia House bill No. 501, to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia system and organizing an active militia force throughout the United States.

I also desire to have entered a similar motion in regard to House bill 102, in regard to educating the militia, which with amendments was recommitted to that committee to-day, on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay those motions to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER. No action can be taken on the motions to reconsider at this time, pending the consideration of the Army bill. The motions will be entered upon the Journal.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the reorganization of the Army.

The pending question was upon the substitute proposed by Mr. DAVIS for the sixteenth section in relation to the quartermaster's department.

Mr. THAYER. I appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] to withdraw his proposed substitute and accept in lieu thereof the corresponding section of the Senate bill, leaving out the three new officers created by that section. It will then read as follows:

That the quartermaster's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; four assistant quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; eight deputy quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; sixteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and forty-eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry, and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

Mr. DAVIS. I will accept that.

Mr. THAYER. If the House will adopt this amendment it will preserve the existing organization of the department. It not only refrains from the injustice which was contemplated, or rather I should say the injustice that would have been done, by the original section of the House bill, before the proviso was offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and which would have turned out of the Army forty-eight assistant quartermasters, four assistant quartermasters general, and three deputy assistant quartermasters general, but it preserves the organization as it now is. And it renders all this verbiage unnecessary—I trust the gentleman will not consider me as meaning any disrespect—which was reported by the committee, simply for the accomplishment of his purpose of getting rid of titles which have been in the quartermaster's department ever since the reorganization of that department in 1838.

Now, I see no objection to those titles. They have worked no inconvenience, and the Quartermaster General himself does not pretend that they have ever worked any inconvenience. They have been preserved throughout the operations of two wars, and in times of peace, and no inconvenience or injury has arisen from them.

I am opposed to the section of the House bill even with the proviso of the gentleman from Ohio; because I think it is entirely unnecessary, because no benefit can be gained by it, and because it is a dangerous innovation upon the present and established organization of the Army. I do not know precisely what the effect of it would be; but it would go further, perhaps, than the gentleman from Ohio himself intends.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I may venture to differ with these gentlemen who are giving us this information, I will say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is utterly mistaken. He says that this amendment proposes to keep the quartermaster's department just where it is. This is not the case. The Quartermaster General wanted the number of officers increased from sixty-five to one hundred or more. The Senate agreed to make the number eighty. We have agreed to make it seventy-six. The gentleman says that his proposition corresponds with the existing law. I do not know where the gentleman gets this impression. The Army Register of this year, relating to those now in office, tells us that while this substitute provides for four colonels, there are now but three; that while this substitute provides for eight lieutenant colonels, there are now but four; that while this substitute provides for sixteen majors, there are now but eleven; that while this substitute provides for forty-eight captains, there are now but forty-six; and that while this substitute provides altogether for seventy-six officers, there are now sixty-six. The amendment is not the provision of the Senate bill; it is not the provision of the House bill; it is not the proposition submitted by the council of general officers; it is not that which was originally reported in the Senate; it is not in accordance with the Army Register. Somebody has got it up, and it will affect somebody and promote somebody; but surely it cannot be pretended that it corresponds either with the House bill or the Senate bill or the Army Register or anything else known to the present law or any proposition pending when the amendment was offered. This is what I undertake to say as matter of fact.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state for his information that the proposed amendment is cut bodily from the Senate bill, and is precisely the provision of the Senate bill, except that I have stricken out the words, "three chief quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general," those words involving the creation of a new office. It is exactly the provision of the Senate bill, omitting that new grade of Chief Quartermaster General.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, I do not know that I have in regard to this matter superior advantages to those of any other gentleman; we all think that we know something about the matter. But I undertake to say this: the first bill reported in the Senate was called Senate bill No. 67, in which these matters were arranged just as each of the bureaus wanted them. That bill was afterward withdrawn, and a new bill, No. 67, was introduced. That new bill was the bill presented to the military council. Those officers went over that bill, suggesting changes in regard to the number of the Army and many other matters; but in scarcely a single instance did they touch these bureau concerns. In general, I believe, they made no recommendation one way or the other in regard to them. Afterward there was introduced into the Senate another bill, No. 138, the bill which has been passed by that body, both the bills No. 67 having been abandoned. In the bill No. 138, the Senate departed from the bills No. 67, and also departed in many respects from the recommendations of this military council. So far as concerns the quartermaster's department, the Senate proposes to have eighty officers in that department, being, as the gentleman says, something like this substitute, with the exception of the three quartermasters general, which the Senate bill provides for, but which he does not include in his substitute.

The Committee on Military Affairs of this House, after a full consultation with the Quartermaster General, hearing all he said upon the one side and the other, during a session of some two or three hours, came to the conclusion not to allow all that he claimed. Nor did they agree entirely with the Senate. There was no question made with this military council. The committee, after full consideration, reported this bill, and I will state the differences in this respect between it and Senate bill No. 138.

The present quartermaster's department, as left at the close of the war—very much increased from what it was before the war—has one brigadier general, three colonels, who are called assistant quartermasters general, four lieutenant colonels, who are called deputy quartermasters general, eleven majors, who are called quartermasters, and forty-six captains, who are called assistant quartermasters; making a total of sixty-five. The Senate bill, departing from the present arrangement, gives us one quartermaster, ranking as a brigadier general; three other brigadier generals, to be called chief assistant quartermasters general; four colonels, to be called assistant quartermasters general; eight lieutenant colonels, to be called deputy quartermasters general; sixteen majors, to be called quartermasters; and forty-eight captains, to be called assistant quartermasters; making a total of eighty.

The House bill provides for one brigadier general in the quartermaster's department, leaving out three other brigadier generals, putting it upon the same footing as the others. It also provides for six colonels, ten lieutenant colonels, fifteen majors, and forty-four captains, making in all seventy-six. It further provides, after the first appointments, as vacancies may occur in the grades of major and captain, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of majors shall be reduced to twelve and the number of captains to thirty. Thereafter the number of officers in each of said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers. That makes a reduction of three in the grade of major and fourteen in the grade of captain. It makes a reduction of seventeen in all, so that there shall be fifty-nine, instead of seventy-six, which is believed to be sufficient for the purposes of the quartermaster's department.

I know that a great many more quartermasters might be employed. I know that the chiefs of bureaus are reluctant to give up any of the offices which they now have. I know officers may be ordered here who will do good service, but no better than clerks can do it. But I will not repeat the argument which I made in reference to the Adjutant General's bureau.

I call attention to the fact that the substitute, so far as brigadier generals are concerned, differs from the Senate bill. It is not what passed under the inspection of the military council. It is not what the House proposed. It is something which gentlemen offer, and which they have a right to offer. We arrived at our results after much examination, finding out how many were necessary for posts and so on, and we submit them to the House and to the country.

Mr. CONKLING obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. DAVIS, who said: I desire to say that the amendment which I sent to the desk to be read as a substitute was cut from the Senate bill. It is Senate bill No. 67. I know they passed a bill, No. 138. I understand that perfectly. I am credibly informed that this amendment received the sanction of the distinguished military gentlemen to whom I have alluded. The original Senate bill provided for eighty-seven. Bill No. 138 reduced that to eighty.

Mr. CONKLING. I now resume the floor. I am persuaded, no matter how amended, this bill will continue to afford harmless occupation; and I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment to move that the Committee on Commerce be allowed to report back a bill for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

THOMAS F. WILSON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back Senate bill No. 146, for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to pay to Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, $1,500 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for extra services, and for all other claims he may have against the Government, while in the service of the United States as consul.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Wilson was consul of the United States at Bahia, Brazil, during the years 1862, 1863, and 1864. During almost the entire time that the petitioner was consul at Bahia, that port was the rendezvous of the rebel pirates for the south Atlantic, where they landed large numbers of prisoners who were captured on board of American vessels on the high seas, and where they met their consorts and tenders for the purpose of obtaining coals, powder, and other supplies. Three of these rebel pirates made the port of Bahia their calling place; two of them, the Alabama and Georgia, being on one occasion there at the same time, where they met their tenders to obtain supplies. One, and sometimes more, of these pirates were constantly cruising in the south Atlantic, and liable at any time to enter the port of Bahia, or to send in prisoners.

The rebels had a regular agent at Bahia, who was the consignee of their supply vessels, discounted their bills, and furnished funds to purchase stores for the pirates.

The frequent visits of the pirates to this port imposed upon the consul the necessity of taking care of, and providing for, large numbers of prisoners landed at different times; also required the utmost activity and vigilance in watching the pirates, and thwarting their efforts to obtain supplies, and required a large amount of consular labor and correspondence with the local authorities at Bahia, the United States minister at Rio de Janeiro, the Department of State, and the commanders of the United States vessels-of-war, to whom he supplied valuable information.

The last of the rebel pirates which visited the port of Bahia, for the purpose of obtaining coals and supplies, was the Florida. Through the efforts of the consul she was prevented from doing so. He was the party who went on board of the Wachusett and gave the information which led to the capture of the Florida.

If the committee had done anything to change the bill it would have been to make the amount larger.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MOORHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WINNEBAGO AND SUPERIOR RAILROAD.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, asking for a grant of land to aid in the construction of so much of the Winnebago and Superior railroad as extends from Doty's Island to Stevens Point; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BUSINESS ON SATURDAY.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Saturday bills on leave, and resolutions, for reference only, may be received by unanimous consent, on condition that they shall not be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. STROUSE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution would relieve the House from much embarrassment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 193) granting lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, in said State;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) manifesting the sense of Congress toward the officers and seamen of the vessels, and others, engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco from perishing with the wreck of that vessel; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) to extend the time for the construction of the first section of the Western Pacific railroad.

WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. McRUER asked unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table joint resolution of the Senate No. 61, to extend the time for the construction of the first section of the Western Pacific railroad.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Mr. ROSS, objected.

STATE AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and hereby is, directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the conversion of State banks now organized into national banks on or before the 1st day of July next, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROSS objected.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BOYER: The petition of Joel K. Markley. By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of J. W. Brecklin, and 37 others, citizens of Woodville, Ohio, for an increase of duties on foreign wools.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 21, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE F. MAGOUN, President of Iowa College.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the President's annual message, upon which Mr. PERHAM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. NICHOLSON.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, numerous and various have been the propositions before the House to amend the Constitution of the United States; but more obnoxious than all the rest, and affecting to a greater extent the whole character of our Government, is the following, upon which I propose to submit a few remarks, namely, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.

So many and able have been the arguments already laid before this House against the adoption, at this time, of this or any other of the proposed amendments to the Constitution, that I might well despair of throwing any new light upon the subject, or increasing by anything I can say the weight of the objections already urged.

I feel additional discouragement in approaching the discussion of this question, from the strong determination evinced by the majority to make this or some other material alteration in our organic law. They seem unrestrained by the ordinary considerations of public policy. They seem insensible to every appeal. They are moved neither by the glorious memories of the past, the wonderful wealth, power, and prosperity we have achieved under the Constitution as it is, nor by the bright prospect that awaits us in the future under a restored Union if we but preserve the "ancient landmarks." Intoxicated with the sudden possession of power, they chafe at every obstacle interposed between them and the gratification of their desires. Assuming with partisan zeal that a certain object must be accomplished, and finding the Constitution standing in their way, they would lay violent hands upon it, and with one blow destroy the beautiful harmony of our entire system of government.

My love and admiration for this system, which has been our pride and boast, forbid that I should now remain silent and unmoved, but rather urge me to stand up, relying on the justice of my cause, and plead for the Constitution of our fathers.

To appreciate fully the great change that would be wrought in the entire structure of our Government by the adoption of the proposed amendment, it will be necessary to consider the history of its formation and its present character, so far as the same is pertinent to the subject under consideration; and I shall do so with that brevity which so familiar a subject and its heretofore frequent discussion demand.

The States which united in framing our Constitution were originally colonies, separate from and independent of each other. They were settled at different times and by people who differed from each other in their habits and their religious and political opinions. Their local customs and regulations differed accordingly. There was no political connection between them; and one thing alone was common to them all, and that was the allegiance which each owed to the British Crown; and I might add the injustice and oppression which finally drove them to arms. This view of their political condition is sustained by Judge Story in his Commentaries, section one hundred and seventy-seven, which I will quote:

"Though the colonies had a common origin, and owed a common allegiance, and the inhabitants of each were British subjects, they had no direct political connection with each other. Each was independent of all the others; each, in a limited sense, was sovereign within its own territory. There was neither alliance nor confederacy between them. The Assembly of one Province could not make laws for another; nor confer privileges, which were to be enjoyed or exercised in another, further than they could be in any independent foreign State."

"And though their mutual wants and necessities often induced them to associate for common purposes of defense, these confederacies were of a casual and temporary nature, and were allowed as an indulgence rather than a right. They made several efforts to procure the establishment of some general superintending government over them all, but their own differences of opinion, as well as the jealousy of the Crown, made these efforts abortive."

Down to the formation of the Constitution this idea of separateness, distinctness, and individuality was maintained. The Continental Congress was simply a deliberative, advisory body. Its acts were in the form of resolutions, and not in the form of laws. It recommended, but did not command. The Declaration of Independence did not change their relation to each other, but changed each of them from a dependent colony to an independent State, with all the attributes of absolute sovereignty. In the earlier treaties with foreign Powers their distinct sovereignty is recognized in their enumeration by name. So in the provisional articles with Great Britain, in 1782, by which our independence was acknowledged, the first article declares that—

"His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, to wit, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such," &c.

And further, from Lawrence's Wheaton, pages 36 and 37:

"Sovereignty is acquired by a State, either at the origin of the civil society of which it is composed, or when it separates itself from the community of which it previously formed a part, and on which it was dependent."

Thus the internal sovereignty of the United States of America was complete from the time they declared themselves "free sovereign and independent States," on the 4th of July, 1776. It was upon this principle that the Supreme Court determined, in 1808—

"That the several States comprising the Union, so far as regards their municipal regulations, became entitled, from the time when they declared themselves independent, to all the rights and powers of sovereign States, and that they did not derive them from concessions made by the British King. The treaty of peace of 1782 contained a recognition of their independence, not a grant of it."

Now, what are the powers of an independent sovereign State? The very statement of the question suggests its own answer. As to external sovereignty we are not inquiring; but in the exercise of internal sovereignty a State must necessarily find no other limitation upon its power than its own will. I will not stop now to enumerate the great variety of these powers, but as to a single point will read again from Wheaton, page 182:

"Every State, as a distinct moral being, independent of every other, may freely exercise all its sovereign rights in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of other States. Among these is that of establishing, altering, or abolishing its own municipal form of government."

The colonies, then, became "free, sovereign, and independent States," and formed with each other a "firm league," by the Articles of Confederation, the second of which reads thus, namely:

"ART. 2. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

The great variety of interests that were involved, as well as local prejudices and jealousies, notwithstanding the necessity of union for the common defense, made it difficult for the Congress to agree upon these articles, and they were not finally ratified until 1781, four years after they had been agreed upon by the Delegates in Congress.

Upon the establishment of peace and the achievement of their independence, having no longer the motive of a common danger inducing them to continue to acquiesce in the exercise by the Confederation of ungranted power, the defects of their Government became manifest. Then it was that, with hearts bursting with love and trembling with fear for the future safety of that precious boon, liberty and independence, which they had acquired, these unselfish patriots applied themselves to the task of remedying its defects. Their object was to form a Government which should possess all the power and energy necessary to constitute a national Government, and yet reserve to the several States the control of their own municipal affairs. Difficult as this task was, we all know how successfully it was accomplished. We can but imperfectly know how great were the difficulties, how various and conflicting the interests, how strong the jealousies, and how opposing the views of the members of the Convention. In the words of James Madison, Federalist, No. 37:

"The real wonder is that so many difficulties should have been surmounted, and surmounted with a unanimity almost as unprecedented as it must have been unexpected. It is impossible for any man of candor to reflect on this circumstance without partaking of the astonishment. It is impossible for the man of pious reflection not to perceive in it the finger of that Almighty Hand which had been so frequently and signally extended to our relief in the critical stage of the Revolution."

The result of this deliberation was that Constitution under which we have lived so long, and to the peculiar character of which we greatly owe all that we have accomplished as a people and as a nation.

It is not for me to eulogize their work, nor does this House need to be instructed in the nature of our Government. But I desire to present in contrast the Government as our fathers made it, and that Government, as gentlemen would have it could they succeed in the adoption of the proposed amendment, to say nothing of the long series of amendments and legislative enactments of a kindred nature that have been introduced.

Our Constitution having been framed and adopted by "free, sovereign, and independent States," bears upon its face marks of conciliation, concession, and compromise, without which it would inevitably have failed. The Government created by it is of a mixed character, partly national and partly Federal. Its powers are delegated powers. Being the creature of the States, it possesses, and can rightfully exert no power with which it was not clothed at the time of its creation, or which it has not since lawfully received.

It follows necessarily that all other powers "are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." But to exclude any other interpretation, the tenth article of the amendments was adopted. The Government having been formed for national purposes, as the common agent of all the States, received all the power necessary for these purposes, while the States retained the exclusive control of their own municipal affairs. Our Constitution derives its chief excellence, and the Government the more strength, from the spirit of conciliation and compromise which animated its framers. It possesses a power of adaptation to all the various stages of our progress which it could not have had if been framed according to the idea of some rigid theorist instead of being shaped and molded according to the requirements of the several States, until it presented a system of government without a model in the world. It cannot be judged by any technical rule. To illustrate and sustain the views I have expressed, the truth of which I have no doubt is conceded, I will read a few extracts from the Writings of James Madison, volume four, page 61:

"It has been too much the case in expounding the Constitution of the United States that its meaning has been sought, not in its peculiar and unprecedented modifications of power, but by viewing it, some through the medium of a simple Government, others through that of a mere league of Governments. It is neither one nor the other, but essentially different from both. It must, consequently, be its own interpreter. No other Government can furnish a key to its true character. Other Governments present an individual and indivisible sovereignty. The Constitution of the United States divides the sovereignty: the portions surrendered by the States composing the Federal sovereignty over specified subjects; the portions retained forming the sovereignty of each over the residuary subjects within its sphere."

The same, page 420:

"The more the political system of the United States is fairly examined the more necessary it will be found to abandon the abstract and technical modes of expounding and designating its character; and to view it as laid down in the charter which constitutes it, as a system hitherto without a model, as neither a simple nor a consolidated Government, nor a Government altogether confederate, and therefore not to be explained so as to make it either, but to be explained and designated according to the actual division and distribution of political power on the face of the instrument."

"A just inference from a survey of this political system is, that it is a division and distribution of political power nowhere else to be found; a non-descript, to be tested and explained by itself alone; and that it happily illustrates the diversified modifications of which the representative principle of republicanism is susceptible, with a view to the conditions, opinions, and habits of particular communities."

And again the same writer in the Federalist, No. 45, says:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

Thus we possess a system of government, which, to a foreign observer, may appear artificial and complex, but which to us, who are furnished with the key, is simple in the extreme. That key is the jealousy which has been apparent through all our history, for the right of each State to control its own domestic affairs, and the firmness with which that right has always been maintained.

From all these various conflicting causes harmony has been evoked; and the most perfect equilibrium is presented to our view in the equal distribution of the Federal powers, in the limitation upon State and Federal power, and the line that is drawn between them; like that huge mass of rock which nature has so nicely poised that a child's hand can disturb its balance, but a giant's strength could not move it from its base.

That nicely adjusted balance is now, by this amendment, to be permanently overthrown. The line of demarcation between State and Federal power, which has been already too much obscured by the great latitude of construction given of late to the several grants of power, is now to be entirely obliterated. The barriers erected by the Constitution to protect the States in the absolute control of their municipal affairs are now to be thrown down for the Federal Government to enter this wide domain, to roam at will, and bring prostrate at the feet of Federal power the most inestimable and most fondly cherished of all civil or political rights. That instrument, framed with such affectionate solicitude by the great and good men of the Revolution, who were actuated by nothing but devotion to the common good, is now to be changed to gratify a savage sectional hate and an inordinate lust for power. Its beauty has already been sadly marred; and it bears upon its face the recently inflicted blow of sectionalism; but this amendment will completely subvert our present system of Government, and is a long stride toward ultimate consolidation. That I am just in thus characterizing it, a brief examination of its provisions will show. It reads as follows:

ARTICLE —. The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.

The employment here, in the first clause of this amendment, of the identical language contained in article four, section two, of the Constitution, seems like an attempt to force upon it a construction that has always been denied by judicial authorities and commentators upon the Constitution; and its use here, in connection with the remaining clause, can only be intended to enlarge its signification without being sufficiently explicit to make its meaning undisputed.

The full force of that section, namely—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States"— was most ably explained and illustrated by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KEAR,] in his speech upon what is known as the civil rights bill, and he sustained his position by a full array of authorities. I will not detain the House with any further remarks upon this point, except to say, that in my opinion, and as far as I have been able to gather from authorities, this section was only intended to relieve the citizens of each State from the disabilities of aliens when removing to, or sojourning in, the several States.

But as the case of Abbott vs. Bayley, 6 Pick., 92, 93, expresses so fully all I would say upon this subject, and is always cited as an interpretation of this clause, I will give it somewhat at large:

"The jurisdictions of the several States as such are distinct, and in most respects foreign. The Constitution of the United States makes the people of the United States subjects of one Government, quoad everything within the national power and jurisdiction, but leaves them subjects of separate and distinct governments. The privileges and immunities secured to the people of each State in every other State, can be applied only in case of removal from one State into another. By such removal they become citizens of the adopted State without naturalization, and have a right to sue and be sued as citizens; and yet this privilege is qualified and not absolute, for they cannot enjoy the right of suffrage or of eligibility to office, without such term of residence as shall be prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State into which they shall remove. They shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens, that is, they shall not be deemed aliens, but may take and hold real estate, and may, according to the laws of such State, eventually enjoy the full rights of citizenship without the necessity of being naturalized. The constitutional provision referred to is necessarily limited and qualified, for it cannot be pretended that a citizen of Rhode Island coming into this State to live is ipso facto entitled to the full privileges of a citizen, if any term of residence is prescribed as preliminary to the exercise of political or municipal rights. The several States then remain sovereign to some purposes, and foreign to each other as before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and especially in regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and estates, the laws of marriage and divorce and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction.

Now, assuming this to be the true meaning of the clause referred to, why make the Constitution repeat itself, or why empower Congress to pass laws in respect to privileges and immunities which have never in the light of this interpretation been denied?

But there can be no mistake in the meaning or intention of the latter clause. By it Congress is authorized to legislate upon the internal affairs of the several States, and in so doing, the only restraint upon its power will be its own conception of what is "necessary and proper."

The immediate object to be accomplished by this amendment I will advert to presently; but let us now consider the propriety of thus robbing the States of their right to regulate their own domestic affairs, and putting such vast power in the hands of Congress.

As I have said before, the great excellence of our Constitution consists in the separation between State and Federal power, and the assignment to each of its proper sphere.

While, very properly, the Federal Government possesses all the powers necessary for the legitimate objects of its creation, to the States has been reserved the exclusive control over all those matters which most deeply affect our welfare and happiness as social beings. To the States alone do we look for "protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property." The greatness of the whole is but the sum of the greatness of the several parts; and it is beneath the fostering care of the State government that the growth and development of each separate political community has proceeded, each having the power to devise just those measures best calculated to promote its own interest, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. We are dependent upon the State government in all the relations we sustain in life. To it and no other do we look for the administration of justice and the punishment of crime. By it are we shielded and protected in the quiet enjoyment of our own fireside. It regulates the transactions of business and trade, protects us in the acquisition of property, secures us in its enjoyment, and provides for its transmission to our posterity. From the cradle to the grave there is no right nor privilege essential to our security and happiness which we do not derive from our State government, and which we would not just as well enjoy if the Federal Government were blotted out of existence. It is right that this should be so. It is an axiom, I think, of political science that the nearer government is brought to the people the more conducive it is to the well-being of the governed. So it is much more likely that the people of a State, as a distinct political community, should know better how to advance their own interests than the people of another State or the representatives of other States could know for them, from whom they might differ in many important particulars.

This was originally their right, and they have reserved it in the Constitution, which forms our Union. And what is now proposed? We are seriously asked to pass this amendment, and invite the States to relinquish their freedom and independence and meekly submit to the interference by Congress in their internal order and Government. We are asked to invest Congress with authority to go peeping and prying into all the multitudinous details, which can possibly be embraced under the general term of "rights of life, liberty, and property," and regulate them by such laws as may be deemed "necessary and proper." We are called upon to erect here the bed of Procrustes, lay the several States upon it, and torture them into conformity to its proportions. While I have the power to resist, I, for one, shall never consent to so dangerous an innovation, so complete a subversion of our present form of Government.

But while the amendment is thus couched in general terms, and is intended to confer this general power, we must not forget that it is urged for a particular purpose.

Gentlemen have declaimed most eloquently on the broad principle of equality, fraternity; but it is nevertheless apparent that negro equality is what is meant. Manhood suffrage is a very pleasant euphemism; but when translated into negro voting it is not quite so captivating. "Equality before the law" is quite a high-sounding phrase, and, as a general principle, is to be admired; but when you come to apply it to all the elements of which our society is composed, the effect is rather startling. Let us substitute the known for the unknown quantity in this article, and then see how it would read.

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the free negroes of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and to free negroes in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.

I am not only opposed to any limitation upon the power of the States, but that opposition is increased, if possible, by the very object which is sought to be obtained. The very fact that this amendment would authorize such legislation as the "civil rights bill" is an additional reason why it should not be adopted. All the arguments urged against the passage of that bill apply with still greater force to this; though gentlemen have not waited until they could obtain constitutional authority for its passage. I certainly think that the negro should be protected in his life, liberty, and property, and believe that he has always enjoyed this protection, and that at this very moment he stands in no need whatever of those who have constituted themselves his especial friends, and clamor now so loudly for his rights. But I also contend that in giving that protection, in conferring rights and privileges, the several States should continue to exercise, as they do now, the power of declaring what shall be their extent, and by what means they shall be secured.

The object of government is not to benefit the individual, but to secure the welfare of the society over which, by common consent, it is established. The individual must yield to those restraints which a community for its own good sees fit to impose. Likewise, when there is a class which can be made certain and definite, it may be treated as an individual, and, if the peace and good order of society require it, may become subject to the same restraints and disabilities. Now, the negro race in this country constitute such a class which is easily and well defined; and the peace and welfare of a State, especially where they are found in great numbers, demand that the radical difference between them and the white race should be recognized by legislation; and every State should be allowed to remain free and independent in providing punishments for crime, and otherwise regulating their internal affairs, so that they might properly discriminate between them, as their peace and safety might require.

For the negro is not actuated by the same motives as the white man, nor is he deterred from crime except by punishments adapted to the brutal, sensual nature which characterizes him. They are not his true friends who are striving to thrust him up to the same level with the whites, when the inevitable result must be a war of races; nor are they true lovers of their country's weal, who for such an object are willing to strike down the power of the States and consolidate the Government into a centralized despotism.

As it is not likely that such an amendment as this will be adopted by three fourths of all the States, and as it has been reported for our consideration from the committee of fifteen on reconstruction, the suspicion naturally arises that the committee intend that its adoption by the southern States shall be a condition precedent to their representation in Congress—I will not say restoration, for peace has long since restored them to the Union, but their Representatives are excluded by the mere exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the majority of this House.

Whether I am correct or not in this suspicion, one thing is certainly true, that so far as legislation for the benefit of the negro is concerned, under the authority of this amendment, those States are chiefly to be affected by it. At the risk of being laughed at, I would ask if it is fair and honorable to take such a mean advantage of a fallen foe. They deserve a better fate at our hands. They met our armies in the open field, and resisted with a courage and endurance that compelled our admiration. Their submission has been as complete as unexpected. This is a constitutional Government, however oblivious we may be of the fact. The cause of the war must have been a violation of the Constitution and laws. The power to carry it on must have been derived from the Constitution, or it nowhere existed. Whatever may have been its secret object on our part, in legal contemplation, and according to declarations at the time, it could only be to preserve the Union and enforce obedience to the Constitution and laws. This being the only object known to the Constitution for which the war was prosecuted, and having succeeded upon our part, it follows that the Constitution and laws have been vindicated and the Union preserved; and the Representatives of southern States have as perfect a right to their seats here as any gentleman on this floor. Their exclusion is revolutionary. And I seriously doubt whether this amendment if passed by Congress, as at present constituted, would be constitutionally before the States for their adoption. For it could never have been deemed possible, when power was given to two thirds of both Houses, to propose amendments, that a majority would have the power to exclude or expel a sufficient number to constitute itself two thirds, and then pass measures which it is conceded could not be passed were all the States entitled represented here.

But these absent States are more immediately interested in this question, by reason of the presence among them of a vast number of that inferior race whose condition has been so recently changed by the abolition of slavery. The negro's idea of freedom is to do nothing but bask in the sunshine. The negro woman now disdains to pick cotton, and her present ambition is to "send her daughter to boarding-school, and keep a piano." And they are assisted very much in these mischievous notions by such legislation as the Freedmen's Bureau and civil rights bill. With these ideas, they must, as a class, become idle and improvident, and a grievous burden upon those States. Already do we hear from many sections of Virginia that farmers despair of raising stock; that their poultry, pigs, and sheep disappear in the most mysterious manner. Now, it would be most destructive, just at this period of transition from one state of society to another, to fetter the power of the States while adapting themselves to this changed condition of things, by appropriate legislation to check their thieving propensities, discountenance vagrancy, and stimulate them to habits of industry. There is no reason why the most ardent philanthropist need fear that this power will be abused. The people of the South are honorable and high-minded. When these creatures were their slaves they were treated as part of their household, with kindness and affection; and the exceptions to this treatment were not more numerous than were to be found in the relation of parent and child, or husband and wife. Give them time to adapt themselves to this sudden and complete revolution in their affairs. Give some heed to the following truthful suggestions of President Johnson in his objections to the civil rights bill:

"The white race and the black race of the South have hitherto lived together under the relation of master and slave—capital owning labor. Now, suddenly, that relation is changed, and, as to ownership, capital and labor are divorced. They stand now each master of itself. In this new relation, one being necessary to the other, there will be a new adjustment, which both are equally interested in making harmonious. Each has equal power in settling the terms, and, if left to the laws that regulate capital and labor, it is confidently believed that they will satisfactorily work out the problem."

But the saddest feature of all this scene is the vindictive spirit which gentlemen manifest in everything that relates to the unhappy South. Have we had introduced here any measures for the relief of that sorely stricken land? Have gentlemen applied themselves to heal the ravages of war and encourage a defeated, humiliated people to resume their former position and contribute, as before, their share to the national greatness and wealth? Alas! no. But what instead do we see? The carnival of death has ceased, but gentlemen are not willing yet to be cheated of their prey, and they carry on the war in another shape. Instead of shot and shell these valiant warriors now fire at them such acts of Congress as the Freemen's Bureau and civil rights bills; and when they think they have driven the iron still deeper into the soul, added another pang to the tortures already inflicted, their exultation, as exhibited here a few days since, marks the intense malignity of their hate.

Surely the war that is past has been punishment enough for the people of the South. It ought to satisfy the keenest thirst for vengeance, that their whole land has been swept with the "besom of destruction," that every house is filled with mourning, and every hillside and valley shows the blackened ruins of a once happy home. Let us cease this unmanly warfare. The work before us requires some of the same spirit that animated our forefathers—the spirit of kindness and conciliation. Let us apply ourselves now to the work of cementing with brotherly love the fragments of a broken Union. While, in the providence of God it may have been necessary that sectional hate and fanaticism should have nerved the arm that struck for victory, they have no office to perform in the duties of the present hour.

Mr. PERHAM. During four long and bloody years the people of this country have struggled for national life and the vindication of the imperishable truths of the Declaration of Independence. Nearly half a million of newly made graves, the lamentations of mourning mothers, widows, and orphans, the presence of maimed and battle-scarred soldiers in the streets, and a debt of enormous proportions attest to the fierceness of the conflict. But thanks to our noble officers and men who, in the hour of danger, left the endearments of home and kindred, and, baring their breasts to the storm of battle, triumphantly bore our flag on a thousand battle-fields, until the weapons of treason were shattered in the hands of their supporters, and the supremacy of the national authority established throughout our entire jurisdiction. A grateful nation will do honor to its living heroes, and the people will make pilgrimages of love and affection to the graves of the slain.

The old ship of state which our fathers, eighty years ago, built according to the best model of that day, and freighted with the fondest hopes of the world, has recently encountered a terrible storm. During its severe trial it has braved the winds and billows, at times appearing almost engulfed in the angry surges, then proudly rising in her majesty, the admiration of her friends and the envy of her enemies, she outrode the storm and anchored in the peaceful waters. All this unparalleled trial could but reveal whatever defect existed in the material or construction. Some timbers have been parted, some holes in the bottom and sides have been made, into which the waters have for some time been rushing, requiring a portion of the crew constantly at the pumps. These holes must be stopped up; some slight repairs to the old ship must be made for her own safety and that of the passengers and crew. We have also exchanged a portion of the freight for an increased number of passengers in the shape of citizens of African descent. Some portion of the vessel heretofore used for the storage of freight must now be appropriated for the accommodation of these additional passengers. Their comfort and well-being must be provided for. They cannot be disposed of as you would store away bags and barrels and boxes. Such reconstruction must take place as will best secure the rights, comfort, happiness, and harmony of all on board. And it is absurd to object to these necessary and indispensable changes in the fear that the old ship might not be recognized.

We have been sent here by our constituents, charged with the important duty of reconstructing this Union in accordance with the enlightened and progressive spirit of the age, and on the basis of complete and impartial justice. They bid us ask nothing more, and charge us, by all the sacredness of our obligations, to accept nothing less. They send us here with no vindictive spirit. The horrors of Fort Pillow and Andersonville have inspired no feelings of revenge. They justly feel themselves masters of the situation, and will not stoop to exult over a fallen foe. While they demand that "treason shall be made odious," and that ample guarantees shall be given against the recurrence of another rebellion, they are willing to accept the least possible amount of punishment and concession that will secure these results. In this spirit I address myself to the discussion of the important questions arising from the present condition of the States recently in rebellion, and whether they are in a suitable condition to be entitled to representation in Congress and intrusted with all the rights and powers of loyal States.

Much has been said and written upon this subject, and the theories are about as numerous as the people who advocate them. But, for our purpose, it is of but little importance whether we regard these States as dead, according to the theory of some members of Congress, or their functions suspended, as the President declares. In any view of this subject these great practical facts remain. In that portion of the South recently in rebellion there is territory, limited and defined by State lines, within the jurisdiction and subject to the control of the United States. And there are people, citizens of the United States and owing allegiance thereto, but without State governments and without any power of themselves to create them. Theorize as we may on this subject, this is the common ground to which we must all come.

The President recognized this principle when he prescribed the manner in which these States are to be reorganized. If they are States in the Union now that the military power of the rebellion has been destroyed, entitled to the rights of loyal States, by what authority has the President exercised, practically, their judicial, executive, and legislative powers? By what authority has he appointed provisional governors, authorized conventions to form constitutions, prescribed the qualifications of voters for delegates to such conventions, and declared what the constitutions when formed should be, and exercised numerous other powers which he could not exercise in the loyal States?

Finding these States, then, at the close of the war without State governments and without power of themselves to create governments, it becomes our duty, in accordance with that provision of the Constitution which makes it the duty of "the United States to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," to provide for the establishment of State governments that shall correspond with the spirit of this and the other provisions of the Constitution, and to guaranty in the strongest possible manner the perpetuity of such form of government. This is just what we have been trying to do for the last five years, but with partial success.

It is the duty of the United States, not only to see that new States to be admitted have such governments, but to "guaranty a republican form of government" in the old States as well. It makes no difference whether the rebellious States are dead or living; the duty of the United States is the same. It is just as much our duty to see that the government of a State continues republican in form as to require it as a condition of admission. Now, what is a "republican form of government?" It is one in which the republican principle is fully recognized; in the common acceptance of the term, it is a government by the people, one in which the rights of all the citizens are equally respected. Can we guaranty a republican form of government in the States recently in rebellion by pursuing the policy heretofore adopted? The President, on his accession to the Presidency, with the best of intentions, as we are bound to believe, inaugurated a policy which he declared to be an experiment, to be modified or abandoned whenever it should become necessary. He has been more than generous toward the late rebels, pardoning them, restoring to them their property, giving them in many instances the entire control of new State governments, doing everything that it is possible for man to do, in the way of kindness, to gain their confidence and good will and secure a compliance with the requirements of good citizenship. But have these acts been reciprocated? Instead of growing better and more loyal under the President's policy, they have grown worse and more disloyal. Instead of accepting in good faith the results of the war, they openly declare that they are only subdued for the time being, and they will now rely on their influence inside the organization of the Government to accomplish what they have failed to do outside by the bullet. Their policy is to render it so uncomfortable and hazardous for loyal men to live among them as to compel them to leave. Many hundreds of northern men who have made investments and attempted to make themselves homes in these States have been driven away. Others have been murdered in cold blood as a warning to all northern men who should attempt to settle in the South. Officers charged with the execution of the laws have been intimidated by threats of violence, and brutally murdered for a faithful discharge of duty.

In Kentucky the courts hold that officers and men who have been in the Union Army are personally responsible for arrests made and property taken during the war by order of their superiors. Many have been imprisoned, and actions are now pending against thirty-five hundred more in pursuance of this ruling of the courts; while officers and men who have been in the rebel army are by the same courts exempted from such liability because of their rights as belligerents. This is but foreshadowing what will take place in all the seceded States as soon as the military force shall be withdrawn.

Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee, who did more, perhaps, than any other man to secure the nomination of Andrew Johnson at Baltimore, in a recent address said:

"You may think it a little strange that I give such counsel. I do it because if General Thomas were to take away his soldiers and pull up stakes and leave here, you would not be allowed to occupy this school-room a week; and if General Thomas and his military forces were to go away and leave us, this Legislature, at the head of which I am placed, would be broken up by a mob in forty-eight hours."

On the 8th of March, 1866, he wrote to a member of this House a letter, from which I make some extracts. He says:

"Since pardons have been so multiplied, and no man has been punished, they have everywhere become impudent and defiant, until in most counties in Middle and West Tennessee it is disreputable to have been a Union man, or, as a southern man, to have served in the Union Army—and matters are growing worse—there constructed traitors openly cursing loyal men, and threatening them with shooting or hanging; boasting that they have the President on their side, while we all feel that the President's policy is ruinous to us.”

“Every rebel in all this country, every McClellan man, and every ex-guerrilla chief, are loud and enthusiastic in praise of the President. The men who but a few months since were cursing him for an abolitionist and traitor, and wishing him executed, are now for executing all who dare oppose his policy or even doubt its success.

“There is twice the amount of bitterness and intolerance in the South to-day toward the Union and everything northern than there was at the time of Lee's surrender. Abuse of Union men, of the radical majority in Congress, and self-assumed superiority on the part of the southern chivalry have arisen to such a height that loyal men cannot travel on a steamboat or in a railroad car without being insulted. As it was during the war, so it is now; all concessions from the North or from the majority in Congress are regarded as evidences of fear. All the old rebel presses of 1861 and many new ones are in full blast, threatening Congress and the North with ultimate vengeance and boasting of southern prowess. The most popular men in the largest portion of Tennessee to-day are the men most distinguished for their hostility to the North and what they are pleased to term the radical Congress, and they are the class of men selected to fill offices, as the late county elections show. The same is true of the entire South, only to a greater extent. In a word, they are resolved on breaking up the Government, and they expect to carry out their scheme through the ballot-box, and how men of candor and intelligence can represent them as loyal and kindly disposed is a mystery to me, even in this age of rebellion and treachery.”

“Why, sir, many of them are expecting the President to disperse Congress with the bayonet, as Cromwell dispersed the Long Parliament. The southern breast is being rapidly fired to deeds of valor; and all this, and more, as I believe, has been caused by the mistakes of the President. His plan of trusting rebels with their State governments has had an effect exactly the opposite of what he intended. It has ruined the prospects of the Union men, and they feel that there is no safety for them unless Congress shall choose to protect them. Even three days ago General Thomas had to send troops into Marshall county, some sixty miles distant, to protect loyal men and freedmen who were fleeing for safety and coming to the city.”

North Carolina has been regarded one of the most loyal of the rebellious States; but, judging from the following from the Raleigh Standard, this State, too, is following her sisters in rebellion in the work of rewarding rebels and punishing loyal men:

“The town of Wilmington, in this State, has recently passed by popular election from the hands of loyal Union men into the hands of original secessionists and latter-day war men. The same is true as to the county court of New Hanover, under the appointment of magistrates made by the Legislature. It is considered disreputable in Wilmington to be an outspoken unconditional Union man. General Robert Ransom, lately of the confederate service, has been chosen marshal of the town, with a salary of $2,000. General K. is, we presume, still unpardoned.”

Colonel Stokes, one of the true men elected to this House from Tennessee, in a recent speech said:

“We know that admission now would destroy the Union element of the States. Congress is doing right in holding them back. When the rebel armies first surrendered, there was everywhere a disposition toward loyalty; but I stand here to-night to say that there is now a feeling as bitter toward the Union men of the South as there was in 1860-61. And the facts have proved that Congress, in its cool and deliberate treatment of the matter, deserves the thanks of all Union men, in giving an opportunity for these rebels to show their hands. Time will show that Congress was right.”

This view of the spirit of the South is confirmed by the necessity which prompted General Grant to issue an order, on the 12th of January last, directing the military power to protect the loyal citizens of the rebellious States from the prejudice and violence of their rebel neighbors, and further to protect colored persons from prosecutions charged with offenses for which white persons are not prosecuted or punished in the same manner and degree.

All the accounts we receive from loyal sources, from Grant, from Schurz, from the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, from every loyal man from the North who has visited the South, from every truly loyal man in the South, by petitions and entreaties, all agree that, if the military force should be removed, it would be impossible for Union men, black or white, to remain there. And yet the reconstructed Governor of Mississippi says they (the Union soldiers) are not needed, that they are “a disturbing element, a nuisance, and a blighting curse.” The rebels desire that the United States troops shall be withdrawn, and their places supplied by State troops composed of officers and men from the rebel army, who would sooner protect the rebel oppressor than the loyal men.

While important service in the rebellion is a sure passport to political and social position and distinction, a systematic effort is made to brand every man with disgrace who has been true to the Government, thus openly and defiantly rewarding treason and punishing loyalty. It is a fact, to which I challenge contradiction, that in spite of all the caution, expostulations, arguments, and demands of the President in regard to the election of loyal men in the States he is attempting to reconstruct, with every consideration of policy urging them to a decent regard, for the time being at least, to the loyal sentiments of the country, the men who have been the most active and efficient in the rebellion are the most popular at the polls, and receive the largest vote. It is very true that some good men, under the pressure of circumstances, have been elected. A few such have been sent here as claimants of seats in this House—men who would honor the position they claim, and with whom we should all be most happy to be associated as members of this Congress, could we feel that they had a loyal constituency, able to maintain a loyal government.

In many instances the disloyalty of the persons voting, or the persons elected, has been so notorious that the President has been compelled to declare the election void, and withhold the certificate of election, or forbid their entering upon the duties of the office. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General both declare that they are unable to find loyal men enough in those States, who are willing to take the prescribed oath, to fill the offices under their Departments, and we are called upon to repeal or modify the oath so as to allow these men, just out of the rebellion, to accept some of the most responsible and lucrative offices under the same Government they have been laboring for four long years to destroy. To a proposition so flagrantly wrong and perilous I will not consent by my vote. If there are not loyal men enough in the South who have been true to the Union to fill these offices, I would appoint some of the heroes of the war, and bid them take part in the administration of the government in the States they have saved by their valor.

A communication from Colonel De Gress, addressed to General Howard, and dated at Houston, Texas, December 15, 1865, says:

“I have the honor to respectfully report that in some portions of this State the negroes are not yet free; that the pass system is still in force, and when a freedman is found at large without a pass he is taken up and whipped.”

Lieutenant Eldridge, writing to the same officer, from Vicksburg, Mississippi, on the 28th of November, 1865, says:

“I have the honor to inclose herewith, for your consideration, the freedmen's bill, which has just become a law in this State, and would respectfully ask your attention to the following points therein:

“Section one prohibits the holding, leasing, or renting of real estate by freedmen.”

“Section four excludes freedmen from testifying in cases of whites.”

“Section five authorizes mayors and boards of police, by their sole edict, to prevent any freedmen from doing any independent business, and to compel them to labor as employes, with no appeal from such decision.”

“Section seven gives the power to any white citizen over the person of a freedman unknown to any other law, and denies the right of appeal beyond the county court.”

Major General Terry, in an order issued at Richmond, Virginia, January, 24, 1866, referring to a statute passed at the present session of the Legislature of Virginia entitled “A bill providing for the punishment of vagrants,” says:

“The ultimate effect of the statute will be to reduce the freedmen to a condition of servitude worse than that from which they have been emancipated—a condition which will be slavery in all but its name.”

A law recently passed by the Louisiana Legislature provides that any one who shall feed, harbor, or secrete any person who shall leave his employer without his consent shall be liable to a fine or imprisonment; thus reviving, as far as possible, the principles of the old slave code. These facts might be multiplied indefinitely, but enough have been presented to show that, while these people accept the fact of emancipation, they believe the principle is wrong, and intend to make the condition of the freedmen as near that of slavery as possible. There are, to be sure, very many good and loyal men in the South, and had they the control of the States all would be well; but the unwelcome truth is the rebels are in the ascendency. Loyalty is the exception and disloyalty the rule.

Governor Cox, of Ohio, in his report of the President's conversation on the 21st of February last makes him speak of what he is doing in those States for the purpose of “stimulating loyalty” no less than six times in that short conversation. I fear that too much of the little loyalty we see manifested by these men is of the “stimulated” kind; that it is a sickly plant at most, and will die out as soon as the stimulation shall cease. I have no confidence in this “stimulating” business. My own observation proves to my mind that, though you may get a little more out of a subject for a day by administering stimulants, in the end he will sink just as much below his natural condition as he has been raised above it. The facts in this case show that the President's southern patient has been stimulated too long, that the medicine has ceased to have any effect, and he is rapidly sinking, and is now even lower than when the first dose was administered.

This is a sad picture, but it represents the spirit of the men who rule a large portion of the eleven seceded States to-day, and but for the presence of the military force would rule them all. Mr. Lincoln held that those States were “out of their practical relations with the Union,” and no one will deny that this state of things exists at the present time. The great work before us is to restore these States to their “practical relations with the Union” at the earliest moment consistent with the future security, peace, and perpetuity of the Government.

On whom devolves the duty of deciding when these States are in a condition to be represented here? Not the Executive. No such power has ever been delegated to him. Not the House of Representatives or the Senate acting independent of each other, but the law-making power of the Government alone is competent to perform this important duty. In confirmation of this view of the subject I add the express declarations of the President himself, through the Secretary of State. On July 24, 1865, Mr. Seward telegraphed to the “provisional governor” of Mississippi:

“The government of the State will be provisional only, until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress.”

So, on September 12, 1865, he wrote to Governor Marvin, of Florida:

“It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.”

Thus it is seen that, as late as September, 1865, both these distinguished men agreed with the majority of Congress that the readmission of these States is to be subject to “the approval of Congress.”

In accordance with the President's and Mr. Seward's original plan, I hold that it is the duty of Congress to take the whole subject into consideration, as it is now doing, and decide just what guarantees it is absolutely necessary to require to secure equal and exact justice to all the citizens, and to prevent the recurrence of another rebellion in the future. This should be secured by such constitutional amendments as cannot fail to accomplish the object; and, on the ratification of these amendments by a vote of the people of these States, as a pledge of their sincerity and loyalty, I would allow them to be represented in Congress on an equal footing with the other States.

I venture to suggest some of the guarantees which, in my judgment, would best secure the well-being and mutual interest both of the North and South.

1. The leading intelligent traitors who knowingly and willingly went into the rebellion—those denominated by President Johnson “conscious traitors”—should be deprived of all political rights for the present at least, and until they shall have brought forth fruits meet for repentance, or the loyal sentiment of the States shall have become so strong as to render them powerless for evil. Aside from a few leaders, who by their official position or infernal conduct have been the representatives of treason, on whose heads should be visited the extreme penalty of a violated law as a vindication of the supremacy of law and order, and a notice to coming generations that henceforth “treason is a crime to be punished and made odious,” I would allow them to live in the country if they desire, and would heap coals of fire on their heads by securing to them full and complete protection of their persons, and the enjoyment of the fruits of their labor. This is all they expected when they laid down their arms; and, it appears to me, is all a rebel possessed of common decency would ask. Even Lucifer himself never had the presumption to insult the Almighty by going back after the overthrow of his rebellion and asking to be permitted to assist in the administration of the government he attempted to destroy, much less to claim the privilege as a right. There is no evidence that these men love the old Union any better now than when they were openly fighting against it. Their arms have been broken, but they are defiant still. They may accept the fact of emancipation, but they still believe that slavery is the best condition for the colored race, and it is but reasonable to suppose that as far as possible this idea would, if they were allowed to govern, be embodied in law, and carried out in their intercourse with the colored people. If I believed slavery to be right, and the relation of master and slave the best condition for both whites and blacks, I should use my influence to make the condition of the colored population as near that of slavery as possible. and if I disliked the form of Government under which I live as those men professed to hate the old Union, I should not cease my efforts to supplant the hated Government and establish one more in accordance with my own idea. Nothing less than this could be expected of me. Is it reasonable to suppose that the recent rebels would do less? Do not the acts of the Legislatures of many of these States just quoted answer the question with alarming significance?

The disloyal leaders who vacated their seats in this Hall in 1861, after having spent four years in an infamous attempt to destroy the Union by force of arms, and in vilifying the Constitution of our fathers without so much as professing to love the “old Government” any better than when they were fighting against it, with the blood of four hundred thousand murdered patriots still unwashed from their hands, ask to come back into the Halls of Congress; and they and some others in high and low places seem to think it very strange that they are not permitted at once to become the guardians of the institutions they so abhor. Before such cool affrontery Satan’s rebellion in heaven falls into insignificance. They have been here before and basely violated their oaths and took advantage of their official position to overthrow the Constitution and Government they had sworn to protect. They are no better now, and we should be false to our high trust to allow these men to come back again to reenact the scenes of 1861.

Suppose in this contest the rebels had succeeded, the old Government been overthrown, and the confederate government, based on the divinity of slavery and the right of secession, had become the government of this nation, what would have become of us here? If we had been permitted to live, we might have thought ourselves fortunate. But suppose the members of this Congress to have been elected to the Congress of the new government. Our Democratic friends on the other side, who have always sympathized with the rebels in their treason and now regard them truly loyal, would find themselves very much at home, and might very properly cooperate with the confederate statesmen and ex-rebel generals in the work of such a Congress. But an unconditional Union man who hates slavery and treason and loves liberty could only go there for the purpose of molding the Government in accordance with his own views. Just so will it be with these ex-rebels if we admit them to legislate for a Government for which they have no sympathy. It will be like taking to our bosoms and warming into life the scorpion whose sting is death. If we should err in this matter and keep the States in question out (or in the position they voluntarily assumed) a little longer than is absolutely necessary, the error can be corrected; but if they are admitted with treason in the hearts of the governing classes of the people the evil may be irreparable.

In this view of our duty in regard to the treatment of leading traitors I utter no new declarations. These are the settled convictions of a large portion of the Union men of the country. They were the principles boldly advocated by President Johnson in his better days, before his head became giddy with power, and southern rebels and northern copperheads led him captive at their will. In the Senate of the United States, March 2, 1861, he said:

“Show me who has been engaged in these conspiracies, who has fired upon our flag, who has given instructions to take our forts and custom-houses and arsenals and dock-yards, and I will show you a traitor. Were I President of the United States I would do as Thomas Jefferson did, in 1806, with Aaron Burr. I would have them arrested, and if convicted within the meaning and scope of the Constitution, by the eternal God I would execute them.”

In a speech made in Nashville, Tennessee, June 9, 1864, indicating his acceptance of the nomination made at the Baltimore convention, two days before, he said:

“Treason must be made odious and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized, and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men. The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of rebellion is past. It is high time it was.”

“But in calling a convention to restore the State, who shall restore and reestablish it? Shall the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization? Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If this be so, then all this precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers so freely poured out will have been wantonly spilled. All the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught, and all the battle-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain.”

I quote further from the same speech in proof of my statement:

“Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished. Therefore I say that traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration. I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government. We say to the most honest and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us, and to add to the wealth of the country, ‘Before you can be a citizen you must stay here for five years.’ If we are so cautious about foreigners, who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor, who, although born and reared among us, has raised a parricidal hand against the Government which always protected him? My judgment is that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship. A fellow who takes the oath merely to save his property, and denies the validity of the oath, is a perjured man, and not to be trusted. Before these repenting rebels can be trusted, let them bring forth the fruits of repentance. He who helped to make all these widows and orphans, who draped the streets of Nashville in mourning, should suffer for his great crime.”

These are precisely the doctrines I advocate to-day, and, in the name of the people I represent, I call upon the President to cooperate with Congress in giving them practical application.

2. All the civil and political rights belonging to citizenship, including the right of suffrage, should be guaranteed to all loyal citizens, irrespective of race or color. The loyal men, white and black, who have always loved the old flag and were true to it in the darkest hours, can now be trusted to aid in the administration of the Government.

Right here it is objected that by placing the colored people on an equality before the law with the whites you will bring about a war of races. And this cry has been heard from the lowest groggery in the land up through all the grades of society to the White House. Do not these people understand that the measures they propose are the only measures that can possibly bring about a war of races in this country? What creates a war of races? It is the application of one law to one race and another to another race in the same community. It is granting privileges to one race which you withhold from the other, thus engendering jealousy, hatred, revenge, and terminating in open hostility. I admit that one hundred and fifty thousand men, trained to war, representing four or five million people stung to madness by the refusal of the Government to recognize their manhood, would be a dangerous element in any Government. But give the colored man the common rights that belong to man, give him an equal opportunity with the whites, subject him to the same laws, award to him the privileges you claim for yourself, bid him God speed in his efforts to raise himself from his degraded condition, and a war of races will be impossible.

Our fathers gave the right of suffrage to free colored men in nearly all the States in the Union, and without any evil results. The idea that the black man has no rights that white men are bound to respect is of modern invention.

We have paid dearly for our refusal to do justice to the colored race. Had we emancipated and enfranchised the colored men when Mr. Seward declared the “irrepressible conflict,” secession would have been impossible. These four years of blood and anguish have been the fearful punishment for our refusal to obey the demands of God’s eternal justice. The sins of the fathers as well as our own have fallen upon us with terrible consequences, and are to be visited upon coming generations in the shape of an enormous debt. And now, though we have given the colored man—what we had no right to withhold from him—his liberty, if we fail to give him the common rights of citizens we may depend on still further judgments from Him who made the black men black, and the white men white, and stamped upon both His own image.

When Mr. Lincoln, on the 1st day of January, 1863, proclaimed liberty to the bondmen, freedom to a race in slavery, and invoked upon the act “the blessing of God and the considerate judgment of mankind,” he meant something more than the mere form of freedom. That act was intended to carry with it the common rights of manhood. And when we called on the black men to assist in saving our imperiled country, we did not intend to avail ourselves of his services on the field of danger and then abandon him to the tender mercies of his former master, made doubly malignant because of his efficient aid to the Union cause. Unless we protect him in his civil rights his liberty is but a solemn mockery. The colored man, by rallying to the standard of a nation which had given him no rights except those of a slave, and bearing aloft our flag in the thickest of the fight, has earned his rights to all the privileges of a man. And if we deny him those privileges a God of justice will frown upon us, and mankind will curse us for our perfidy.

The practical question presented is, whether we will restore the government of the States recently in rebellion to the loyal or disloyal men. Will you trust the men who were hunted down by dogs, plundered of their property, imprisoned in loathsome dungeons, compelled to see their wives and little ones cruelly treated, exiled from their homes, driven to the mountains, to caves, and rocks, compelled to see their loyal associates shot down like dogs, dragged to the scaffold and hung as felons, and subjected to all the outrages and indignities that devils could invent, and still stood true to the old flag, faithful among the faithless, or the men who were the authors and active perpetrators of all these cruelties? Shall we give heed to the entreaties of the men who have always been true and never faltered, and who now implore us to protect them from the rage of their rebel neighbors, or the recent traitors in arms who come to us with their hands still reeking with the blood of our murdered brothers, and, without any evidence of sorrow for what they have done, or the least signs of regret for their stupendous wickedness, demand an opportunity to accomplish by the ballot and other civil influences what they have failed to do by the sword?

Some say if you give the ballot to the negro his old master will control it. So when we talked about putting them in the Army it was said they would turn against us and fight for their old masters; but when were soldiers truer than they? Go ask at Port Hudson, at Milliken's Bend, and Fort Wagner, where their spirits went up from their black bodies to their God in defense of liberty, the Constitution, and the Union, and tell me whether these men can be depended on. The men who will peril their lives on the field of battle in defense of our Constitution will vote for it if you will give them an opportunity.

It is objected that the colored people are too ignorant to be intrusted with the ballot, but it is an objection that applies only to color. The most ignorant foreigner that ever landed from an emigrant ship, the most benighted poor white in all the South, is deemed a safe depository of this important trust, providing he has no shade of African blood in his veins. Scarcely a black man can be found in the whole country who was so ignorant that he did not know and choose the right side during the war, while his intelligent master was generally on the wrong side. I would sooner trust a loyal black man with the ballot than a disloyal white man. The argument that would exclude a poor or ignorant colored man from the right to vote would also exclude the poor or ignorant white man. The more this question is discussed the stronger are the convictions of the people "that the only way to secure and perpetuate our Government in its purity is to confer upon all the races of men equal rights, or such opportunities as will prepare them for the enjoyment of equal rights." And the time is not far distant when the people of this country will acquiesce in this principle as fully as they now do in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, which our Democratic friends so strenuously opposed.

In these views I also find myself sustained by the declarations of the President. In his Nashville speech, before referred to, he said:

"If there be but five thousand men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom, loyal to justice, these true and faithful men should control the work of reorganization and reformation absolutely."

In August, 1865, the President recommended to Governor Sharkey, of Mississippi, the extension of the franchise "to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250 and pay taxes thereon."

In October last the President was in favor of negro suffrage. He then said to Major Stearns:

"My position here is different from what it would be if I were in Tennessee. There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually: first, those who had served in the Army; those who could read and write; and perhaps a property qualification for others, say two hundred or two hundred and fifty dollars."

In October, 1864, just before his election, Andrew Johnson addressed a gathering of colored people in Nashville, and said:

"I, Andrew Johnson, hereby proclaim liberty, full, broad, unconditional liberty, to every man in Tennessee. I will be your Moses, and lead you through the Red Sea of struggle and servitude to a future of liberty and peace. Rebellion and slavery shall no more pollute our State. Loyal men, whether white or black, shall govern the State."

3. We should forever prohibit the payment of the confederate and State debts contracted in aid of the rebellion, and prohibit the nation and the States from making payment for emancipated slaves. Already the less cautious rebels are talking about being able, by the aid of northern Democrats, when they shall be represented in Congress, to compel the General Government to assume their debt or repudiate the whole. James L. Orr, the so-called Governor of South Carolina, says:

"I therefore cherish the hope that Congress will, as soon as the public debt is provided for, make some just and equitable arrangement to make the citizens of the South some compensation for the slaves manumitted by the United States authorities."

General Schurz, in his report to the President, says:

"In fact, there are abundant indications, in newspaper articles, public speeches, and electioneering documents of candidates, which render it eminently probable that on the claim of compensation for their emancipated slaves, the southern States, as soon as readmitted to representation in Congress, will be almost a unit. In the Mississippi convention the idea was broached by Mr. Polter, in an elaborate speech, to have the late slave States relieved from taxation for years to come, in consideration of debts due them for the emancipated slaves; and this plan I have frequently heard advocated in private conversations."

Hon. John Covode, in his account of an interview with Governor Wells, of Louisiana, says:

"He began to make demands with regard to what Government should do. He said that Government must pay for slaves that had been emancipated, for it had taken or destroyed property enough for that purpose."

This is the programme now shadowed forth, and which, if not put to rest forever, will be a source of infinite trouble to us hereafter. We owe it to the loyal tax-payers North and South to provide that they shall not be taxed to pay the expenses of a war to destroy the nation's life; and we owe it to the holders of our national securities, as well as our own credit and financial stability, to provide by amendment to the fundamental law that none of these pretended claims shall ever be paid.

4. The doctrine of secession should be repudiated and branded with everlasting infamy. This proposition is too plain to need argument now. The experience of the last four years, the graves of four hundred thousand fallen heroes, the emblems of mourning all over the country, all speak in thunder tones, demanding that this doctrine hereafter shall find no place among the possibilities of the country.

The Union members of Congress earnestly desire to avoid any conflict with the President. They will have none except so far as he repudiates the principles which gave him the election in 1864. They ask nothing that the principles heretofore expressed by him, and enforced in his administration of affairs in the States recently in rebellion, do not absolutely justify and require.

But it is objected that our plan contemplates amendments to the Constitution, and the President says, "Amendments to the Constitution ought not to be so frequent that their effect would be that it would lose all its prestige and dignity." The President lost sight of this idea when, in the Senate of the United States in December, 1860, he proposed no less than nine amendments to the Constitution in one day. He repudiated this idea when speaking for the votes of the American people in Nashville soon after his nomination for Vice President. He said:

"I hold, with Jefferson, that Government was made for the convenience of man, and not man for Government. The laws and constitutions were designed as instruments to promote his welfare. And hence, from this principle, I conclude that Governments can and ought to be changed and amended to conform to the wants, to the requirements, and progress of the people and the enlightened spirit of the age."

"And let me say that now is the time to secure these fundamental principles, while the land is rent with anarchy and upheaves with the throes of a mighty revolution. While society is in this disordered state, and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundations of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time."

And now, in 1866, the loyal people of the country say amen, and call upon the author to coöperate with their representatives in securing such amendments as the changed condition of things demand; and to conform "to the requirements and progress of the people and enlightened spirit of the age," and I to "fix the foundation of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time."

Because of the enunciation of such principles as I have quoted, and others corresponding thereto, the true men of this country rallied around Andrew Johnson, and triumphantly elected him to the second office within their gift.

I have quoted to some extent the declarations of the President to show that when a candidate for the suffrages of the people, and even later, he favored every proposition that the majority of Congress desire to adopt. If he will now, in his high position, carry out the principles he then avowed, a confiding people will rally around him and hold up his hands in the great work, and future generations will hold his name in grateful remembrance. Failing to do this, the terrible judgment of popular condemnation awaits him.

Mr. Speaker, I am no alarmist. I believe in a glorious future for this country, but on the express condition that we prove ourselves deserving such a future. The day of our peril is not yet past. Already in the North a large, and in some States a powerful, party who from the beginning of the war have sympathized more with the rebellion than the Government, are coming forward to meet their southern friends, and over the graves—not yet covered with the verdure of a single season—of the nation's fallen heroes, whom one has branded as murderers and the other has slain, they propose to shake hands, and pledge themselves to place this Government in the hands of those who but yesterday were striving to destroy it, and threaten revolution if their demands are not acceded to; and, "tell it not in Gath," they claim a President elected by loyal votes to coöperate with them. Already a Senator rises in his place and declares that "it is the duty of the President to ascertain who constitute the two Houses of Congress," and calls upon him to "recognize the Opposition here and the southern members as a majority of the Senate." Another Senator, at a recent meeting in this city, is reported to have said that "he believed to-day that a revolution is pending, and President Johnson would have better work for southern men than hanging them. He believed to-day that when Jeff. Davis left the Senate he was a better Union man than Abraham Lincoln. This he would say on the floor in Congress before he got through."

The New York World suggests that the "present national Legislature should be put down by force," and the Constitutional Union talks about the "second advent of Cromwell of England, or of Napoleon of France;" while the Macon Telegraph echoes back from Georgia the sentiment of its northern allies, and declares that "the ballot-box is too slow a remedy for existing grievances," and adds:

"Let the President put down the rebellion in Congress and appeal to the ballot-box to sustain that."

And continuing further in the same strain, it says:

"We prefer peaceable means; but, these failing, the President should issue his proclamation declaring the Union fully restored, and inviting the southern members of Congress to enter the Capitol and take their seats. If refused admittance, a regiment of United States troops should be sent to put the southern members in their places."

The proclamation has been issued, but the southern members and the regiment of United States troops have not yet appeared.

The Chicago Times says:

"We do not hesitate to declare that it is the solemn duty of the President to follow his words by deeds. We do not hesitate to declare that it is the solemn duty of the President to command the arrest of Thaddeus Stevens, Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and their confederates in Congress and all over the country, for the crime of treason. In no other way can this northern rebellion be promptly quelled and the public quiet restored."

And if the rump Congress shall not speedily abandon its seditious, revolutionary, and lawless prac-times, if it shall persist in excluding the representatives of eleven States from their rightful seats, and in exercising the powers of the Congress of the United States, we do not hesitate to declare that it will become the solemn duty of President Johnson to constitute himself the Cromwell of the time, and dissolve the rump by military power."

C. C. Burr, a Democratic orator and writer, in his paper, the Old Guard, in the issue of January, 1866, in eulogizing General R. E. Lee, says:

"It is a question which impartial and inexorable history will have to settle whether a success on his part would not have proved a benefit to his country."

He further says:

"When every Democratic editor will speak out his real thoughts and say boldly and defiantly that he believes men like General Robert E. Lee to be patriots, and men like Stanton and Seward to be traitors, there will be more honest men in the land than there are now, and there will be better hope for liberty—for our country's lasting peace and honor."

When I remember that those "Democratic editors" have never uttered a word in condemnation of the action of General Lee from the time he ignominiously betrayed the confidence of General Scott and the country, and basely drew his sword against the Government on whose patronage he had lived, to the present time, and that they have never ceased to apply the vilest epithets to the other two distinguished men named, I cannot avoid the conviction that Mr. Burr speaks what he knows on this subject.

For myself, standing in my place in the American Congress, representing a people who have freely poured out their treasure and their blood that this nation might live, and speaking for thousands of homes made desolate by the war, with the dust of the bravest and best of my constituents sleeping in patriots' graves, almost within sound of my voice, I am ready to swear, by all the sanctity of this free-will offering, that I will never consent, by my vote, that the Government of this country shall be taken from the loyal citizens who have saved it by their blood and given to traitors. Could I be so false and base as to do so, I should expect the gory dead to rise up in judgment against me.

We have emerged from the greatest military struggle on record, and now a moral contest has commenced. Already we have had seeming defeat. Already our enemies boast that our chosen leader is in sympathy with them and against us. God grant that the experience of the war may not be repeated; and that we may not be subjected to three years of political McClellanism and Chickahominy anguish, before a Grant shall be found to lead us on to victory.

There is a grandeur in the contest we are entering amounting to the sublime. Our people have stood unawed and invincible in the midst of the thunder and smoke of terrible battle, when carnage and death held high carnival. It remains for us to show to the nations of the earth that we can stand erect in this moral conflict, and, with hearts strong and undaunted, meet every responsibility incident to the great work which devolves upon us. The result of this conflict is not doubtful. We may not now be worthy to enter the promised land of peace and prosperity which lies before us. Months and years even of severe conflict may intervene, but we shall surely win at last. While God sits on His throne, right and justice are indestructible. Men may attempt to raise their puny arms and fight against His purposes, but they will be paralyzed. The man who expects to turn the Union party of this country from its convictions of duty by executive influence, will soon find he has mistaken the men who compose it. They have written their principles in letters of blood and will not abandon them. The equal rights of all men before the law in this country is foreordained of God; and he who puts himself in the way of its accomplishment will find that the terrible "groundswell of popular judgment," referred to by the President in his speech of the 22d of February, will open a chasm beneath his feet in which he will be buried out of sight.

While the nation to-day, in her tears and ghastly wounds, bows her head before Him who has given us the victory, she makes the solemn pledge that justice and equal rights to all her people shall be the rule of her conduct, and that every element which tends to injustice and oppression shall be removed from the basis of the reconstructed Union, and that our glorious banner with every star restored, shining forth with a brighter luster than ever before, with liberty written in letters of living light on its ample folds wherever it may float, on land or sea, shall be the symbol, not merely of might and power, but of justice, and the highest civilization of human governments, inspiring the great heart of universal humanity with better hopes, and prompting to nobler endeavor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed House bill No. 238, to amend an act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, approved March 8, 1863, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir.

Also, that the President of the United States had approved sundry acts and joint resolutions of the Senate.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield a few moments to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, much has been said in regard to reconstruction, and as it is one of the most momentous questions that has ever devolved upon Congress since the formation of our Government, it is well that it has attracted the serious consideration of both Houses of Congress.

The wicked rebellion having been crushed, the next great question for us to legislate is, to try to prevent a similar outbreak; and to this Congress the nation looks for a guarantee of permanent security. The Union, in legal contemplation, is perpetual. It is much older than the Constitution formed by the Articles of Association of 1774, matured and continued by the Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776. It was further matured, and the faith of the then thirteen States expressly plighted and engaged that it should be perpetual, by the Articles of Confederation of 1778, and finally in 1787 the declared objects for ordaining and establishing the Constitution were "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Thus the original thirteen States were by solemn compact cemented together. And the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution provides that new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union.

Has any State which formed a part of this Union a right, under the Constitution, to secede? That right is nowhere admitted in that sacred instrument, but the very contrary is inculcated.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Cohen vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 390, says:

"The people made the Constitution and the people can unmake it; it is the creature of their will and lives only by their will. But the supreme invisible power to make or unmake resides only in the whole body of the people; not in any subdivision of them. The attempt of any of the parts to exercise it is usurpation and ought to be repelled by those to whom the people have delegated their power of repelling it."

Mr. Madison in his letter to Mr. Trist, in 1822, says:

"I partake of wonder that the man you nameshould view secession in the light mentioned. The essential difference between a free Government and a Government not free is that the former is founded on compact, the parties to which are mutually and equally bound by it; neither of them, therefore, have a greater right to break off from the bargain than the others have to hold them to it, and certainly there is nothing in the Virginia resolutions of 1788 adverse to this principle, which is that of common sense and common justice. The fallacy which draws a different conclusion lies in confounding a single party with the parties to a constitutional compact of the United States; the latter having made the compact may do what they will with it, the former, as only one of the parties, owes fidelity to it till released by consent or absolved by an intolerable abuse of the power created. It is high time that the claim to secede at will should be put down by public opinion."

Also Mr. Madison, in his letter to Mr. Everett in 1830, said:

"If [the Constitution] was formed by the governments of the component States, as the Federal Government for which it was substituted was formed; nor was it formed by a majority of the people of the United States as a single community, in the manner of a consolidated Government. It was formed by the States—that is by the people in each of the States acting in their highest capacity, and formed consequently by the same authority which formed the State constitutions."

"Being thus derived from the same source as the constitution of the States, it has within each State the same authority as the constitution of the State, and as such a constitution in the strict sense of the term, within its prescribed sphere, as the constitution of the States are within their respective spheres, but with this obvious and essential difference, that being a compact among States in their highest sovereign capacity, and constituting the people thereof one people for certain purposes, it cannot be altered or amended at the will of the State individually, as the constitution of a State may be at its individual will."

General Jackson, in his letter to Colonel Hamilton, of November 2, 1812, and the one to Mr. Crawford, of May 1, 1833, takes strong grounds against the right of secession. In the latter he uses this patriotic language:

"Take care of your nullifiers; you have them among you; let them meet with the indignant frowns of every man who loves his country. Haman's gallows ought to be the fate of such ambitious men."

Mr. Lincoln very properly said in his inaugural address of March 4, 1861:

"Physically speaking, we cannot separate; we cannot remove our respective sections from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them. A husband and wife may be divorced and go out of the presence and beyond each other, but the different parts of our country cannot do this. They cannot but remain face to face."

And in his first message to Congress on the 4th of July, 1861, he stated that—

"The Constitution provides, and all the States have accepted the provisions, that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, but if a State may lawfully go out of the Union, having done so, it may also discard the republican form of government; so that to prevent its going out is an indispensable means to the end of maintaining the guarantee mentioned."

And finally, in his message of 2d of March, 1862, he repeated that—

"The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed."

I need not, however, consume time in citing authorities against the right of secession, for even Mr. Buchanan, under whose administration the rebellion was matured, in his last message, delivered on Tuesday the 4th day of December, 1860, denied that "secession" could be justified as a constitutional remedy, and asserted that the principle is wholly inconsistent with the history as well as the character of the Constitution, but said he could not find anything in the Constitution to coerce a State into submission which is attempting to withdraw from the Confederacy, (notwithstanding the Constitution which he had sworn to support required him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed,) and for this dereliction of duty his country, on which his administration inflicted so much misery, will hold him responsible.

But again, the seed of secession, for many years sown broadcast in the then slave States and especially in South Carolina (which was the nest of treason) has been eradicated by the blood of more than three hundred thousand as brave men as the world ever saw who fell battling in defense of the flag of this great Republic; and another great moral victory was achieved by this bloody conflict, which was the overthrow of a system conceded by every true patriot to be incompatible with a republican form of government, and that is slavery.

There are eleven States that the leaders of the rebellion claim to have seceded, and the question has been raised in the discussion as to the present status of these States. The honorable chairman of the committee on reconstruction [Mr. STEVENS] in an able speech delivered in the House on the 18th day of December last, takes the ground that these rebel States severed their original compact and broke all ties that bound them to the Union, and are to be treated as conquered provinces, or, to use his language—

"Unless the law of nations is a dead letter, war between two acknowledged belligerents severed the original compact and broke all ties that bound them together; the future condition of the conquered Power depends on the will of the conqueror. They must come in as new States, or remain as conquered provinces."

And he again remarks in the same speech—

"I cannot doubt that the late confederate States are out of the Union to all intents and purposes for which the conqueror may choose to consider them"— and cited several authorities which he claims to sustain his position, among which are Vattel, Phillimore, and 2 Black's United States Supreme Court Reports, and in a great measure assumed the same position in his speech of the 10th of March.

Though I have great respect for the learning and statesmanship of my distinguished colleague, I cannot subscribe to all the doctrines enunciated by him. It may, however, be proper to state here that the honorable gentleman did not pretend to express the views of the Republican party, for in the speech first delivered he, with his usual candor and fairness, says:

"I trust the Republican party will not be alarmed at what I am saying; I do not profess to speak their sentiments, nor must they be held responsible for them. I speak for myself and take the responsibility for them."

Nor can I agree in all the views of my learned colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] although his speech, for its learning and research, reflects great credit upon its distinguished author, nor can I to all contained in the able speech of that distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in which is displayed much legal learning, and was delivered with great force. The authorities, however, cited by him do not, in my opinion, sustain his position as applicable to the so-called rebel States. The two latter gentlemen do not profess to go the same length as the former. I am certain that neither of these distinguished gentlemen will concede the right of secession under the Constitution to any of the States of this Union. Then, if no such right exists to peaceably withdraw, can the citizens of any State or number of States by force, short of a successful revolution, take such State or States out of this Confederacy?

I hold that no rebellious act can force a State out of the Union; that notwithstanding the rebellion, it still remains a part and parcel of it, as much as an arm is an integral part of the human body; though, owing to the rebellion, it may for a time be somewhat paralyzed. I would accord to the rebels no such honor as having been successful in taking the eleven rebel States, or any one of them, out of the Union, and now to be treated as conquered provinces. But suppose we should admit these States had forced themselves out of the Union, and no constitutional prohibition adopted, how would we stand in regard to the rebel debt? In Wheaton's Elementary International Law, page 93, it is laid down that—

"As to public debts, whether due to or from the revolutionized State, a mere change in the form of government or in person of the ruler does not affect the obligation."

"The essential form of the State—that which constitutes it an independent community—remains the same, its accidental form only changed. The debts being contracted in the name of the State by its authorized agents for its public use, the nation continues liable for them, notwithstanding the change in its international condition. The new Government succeeds to the fiscal rights, and is bound to fulfill the fiscal obligations of the former Government. It becomes entitled to the public domain and other property of the State, and is bound to pay its debts previously contracted."

I cite this authority merely to show the increased difficulties we might have to encounter by adopting the doctrine of the rebel States having been out of the Union.

Considerable has been said as to what is required to constitute a State and attempt to show that the rebel States, as they are called, cannot be "States." In Wheaton's International Law, pages 57 and 58, it is said:

"A State, as to the individual members of which it is composed, is a fluctuating body, but in respect to society it is one of the same body of which the existence is perpetually kept up by a constant succession of new members. This existence continues until it is interrupted by some change affecting the being of the State. If this change be an internal revolution, merely altering the municipal constitution and form of government, the State remains the same; it neither loses any of its rights nor is it discharged from any of its obligations."

"The habitual obedience of the members of any political society to a superior authority must have once existed in order to constitute a sovereign State. But the temporary suspension of that obedience and of that authority in consequence of civil war does not necessarily extinguish the being of the State, although it may affect for a time its ordinary relation with other States."

And in Vattel, 423, one of the cases cited and relied on by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] it is said:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect."

There is no doubt that the civil operations of the Government were for awhile suspended as regards the rebel States, but that would not prevent the Government from exercising that right as soon as the rebellion was crushed, nor would it be any acknowledgment that these States were separated from the Union. Much has been said and authorities cited in regard to ancient Governments which have but little application to a Government like ours. We may look in vain into ancient history to find one constituted like the United States, for even in the most enlightened days of the Grecian republic piracy was regarded as an honorable employment.

The law of nations, as understood by the European world and by us, is the offspring of modern times. It is truly said in Phillimore on International Law, page 138, (33 Law Library, 138:)

"That the United States of North America furnishes us the greatest example which the world has yet seen of a Federal Government; that its Constitution differs materially from the Germanic Confederation: the latter is a league of sovereign States for the common defense against external and internal violence, the former is a supreme Federal Government; it is in fact a composite State, the constitution of which affects not only members of the Union but all its citizens both in their individual and corporate capacities."

And the same doctrine is recognized in Wheaton's International Law, page 92. But it has been said that during the four years of bloody conflict the so-called rebel States were acknowledged by the United States as belligerents, and to sustain this theory 2d Black's United States Supreme Court Reports, which is known as the prize cases, has been cited and relied on. It cannot be denied that the rebellion against the Government of the United States assumed a gigantic form; that the rebel government had enforced obedience to its authority over a large region of country, and over many millions of people; that it had by force excluded temporarily the operation of the laws of the United States; and that our Government has in many ways recognized the contest as a civil war, and from motives of policy and humanity could not act strictly upon legal principles, but ex necessitate rei adopted so much of the civil warfare as would prevent indiscriminate slaughter and the infliction of unnecessary pain and hardship.

This was done without in any manner recognizing the rebel leaders or their organization, but constantly denying them to be a Government de facto or de jure. On examination of all the proclamations of the President, beginning with that of the 15th of April, 1861, and all the principal laws of Congress, I have not been able to find a single executive or legislative act which conceded a governmental status to the so-called rebel confederacy. The whole ground of legislation has been aimed to suppress insurrection, punish treason, and confiscate property of rebels. The most important bill on that subject that passed Congress is the one approved July 17, 1862, entitled:

"A bill to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes."

The so-called southern confederacy certainly was not a Government de jure; all its actions were a gross violation of rights. It was nowhere a recognized Government. It was never admitted into the family of nations. Every rebellion or insurrection is in reality a war, and it becomes more evidently such when it brings hundreds of thousands of men into the field; still, it is only a rebellion, and the citizens of the rebellious portion are only rebellious citizens, over whom the Government possesses not only all its legal rights, but all those powers which a state of war confers upon it.

As regards the United States, all the ordinances of secession were null and void, and the so-called southern confederacy was an entire and complete nullity, and the rebellious people may very properly have been treated as rebels and enemies. They may be tried as traitors and punished. The Supreme Court, in the prize cases, decided no more than this, that being engaged in a war with rebels the President had a right, jure belli, to blockade ports in possession of States in rebellion, which neutrals were bound to regard. There is no intimation of an abrogated Constitution or an outside status. Had this question been before the court no doubt Justice Grier would have adhered to his own opinion in case of the pirates, in which that eminent judge said:

"Every Government is bound by the law of self-preservation to suppress insurrection, and the fact that the number of the insurgents may be so great as to carry on a civil war against their legitimate sovereign will not entitle them to be considered a State. The fact that a civil war exists for the purpose of suppressing a rebellion is conclusive that the Government of the United States refuses to acknowledge their right to be considered such. Consequently this court, sitting here to execute the laws of the United States, can view those in rebellion in no other light than traitors to their country, and those who assume by their authority a right to plunder the property of our citizens on the high seas, as pirates and robbers."

My colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] in his speech, recites a few words of what Justice Grier said in the prize cases, when speaking in relation to insurrections against Governments, as follows:

"When a party in rebellion occupy or hold in hostile manner a certain portion of country, have declared their independence, have cast off their allegiance, have organized armies, have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents, and the contest is a war."

But in the same paragraph that judge continues:

"They claim to be in arms to establish their liberty and independence in order to become a sovereign State, while the sovereign treats them as insurgents and rebels who owe allegiance and who should be punished with death."

This does not conflict with the opinion given by that distinguished jurist in the trial of the pirates, but is in confirmation of the fact that the United States did not acknowledge the rebel confederacy as a belligerent.

It cannot be disputed but that during the rebellion the civil laws could not be enforced over those States, and consequently the functions thereof were in a great measure suspended. But this fact, as the authorities heretofore cited show, did not place those States out of the Union, or destroy their status as States, and turn them into Territories.

During all that trying period there was still prevailing (though in a great measure suppressed) a Union element in those States which did much in aiding to crush out the rebellion. If there had been found in Sodom and Gomorrah ten righteous men, we are told that those cities of the plain would have been saved from destruction, and surely more than that number of true loyal men could have been found in each of the rebel States, even South Carolina not excepted. And are we more uncharitable than He who holds in his hands the destiny of worlds?

And again, had not the loyal citizens of those States a right to claim that they were citizens of the United States and entitled to protection under the Constitution, as did the inhabitants of Rome by claiming that they were Roman citizens?

In Vattel's Law of Nations, page 6, it is laid down—
